Objectives: To familiarize the students with religious practices and beliefs in the various human cultures, to consider the main sociological theories of religion and analyze the various types of religious organizations in different societies. The course also intends to introduce students with religions of India and their main components.

Unit - I

Religion:

Definition; Composition and Features of Religion; Beliefs and Rituals; Magic, Religion and Science; Sacred & Profane; Church; Cult and Sect; Priests, Shamans and Prophets.

Unit - II

Sociological Interpretations of Religion:

Origin of Religion (Evolutionary); Durkheim & Sociological Functionalism; Weber & Phenomenology; Marx and Dialectical Materialism, Indian Perspective - Gandhi, Ambedkar and Vivekananda.

Unit - III

Religions of India & their Components:

Hinduism; Islam; Buddhism; Christianity; Sikhism; Jainism; Saints/ Sants, Sadhus and Shrines.

Contestation over Religion in India:

Socio-religious Movement; Religious Pluralism, Fundamentalism; Communalism; Secularism; Religion and Globalization.

NOTE FOR PAPER SETTING:

The question paper will consist of three sections A, B & C.

Section A will consist of eight long answer type questions, two questions from each unit with internal choice. Each question carries 12 marks. The candidate is required to answer any four questions, selecting one from each unit. Total weightage will be of (12 x 4 = 48 marks).

Section B will consist of eight short answer type questions, two questions from each unit with internal choice. Each question carries 6 marks. The candidate is required to answer any four questions selecting one from each unit. Total weightage will be of (6 x 4 = 24 marks).

Section C will consist of eight objective type questions - one mark each. The candidate is required to answer the entire eight questions. Total weightage will be of (1 x 8 = 8 marks).

1.0 Objectives

The main objective of this lesson is to equip you with:

- The meaning of Religion
- Sociology of Religion.
- Theoretical Perspective of Religion.

1.1 Introduction

It is difficult to define religion. The difficulty is because of the fact that there are several religions and there is no single definition on which there is agreement. However, religion is a set of beliefs, symbols, and practices and such as rituals which are based on the ideas of the sacred, and which unites believers into a socio-religious community. The sacred is contrasted with the profane because it involves feelings of awe. Sociologists have defined religion by reference to the sacred rather than to a belief in a God or Gods, because it makes social comparison possible. For example, some versions of Buddhism do not involve a belief in God. Religion is also contrasted with magic because the latter is thought to be individualistic. Connected to religion are invisible religion, new religion and secularization.

Majumdar and Madan (1963) have defined religion in Indian context. They write:

Then there is religion; it is the human response to the apprehension of some thing or power, which is supernatural and supersensory. It is the expression of the manner or type of adjustment, effected by a people with their conception of the supernatural.

Actually, religion had been regarded as product of civilization until Tylor gave convincing proof that primitive societies have their own versions of religious activity, not very different from that of civilized societies. Ever since Tylor's views were published, no ethnographer has ever reported any primitive society without religious beliefs and practices.

1.2 Definitions and Features of Religion

Literally the term 'religion' stands for the principle of unification and harmonization (Latin: Religionis: re=back; ligare=bind). The term religion indicates that the two objects of unification were originally unified and that they are only temporarily separated. Religion is thus founded on the faith in the ultimate unity of humans and God. Any religion which seeks to unite human with anything else other than divine is bound to remain imperfect.

Various thinkers have attempted to define religion in the following manner:

- 1) Max Müller in his book "Science of Religion" termed religion as "a mental faculty or disposition which enables human to apprehend the infinite".
- 2) E.B. Taylor in his work "Primitive Culture" defines religion as "a belief in spiritual beings".
- 3) Hoffding in his work "Religious Philosophy" describes religion as "faith in the conservation of value."
- 4) Galloway defines religion as a "man's faith in a power beyond himself whereby he seeks to satisfy emotional needs and gains stability of life and which he expresses in acts of worship and service."
- 5) William James defines religion as "the feelings, acts and experiences of individual men in their solitude so far as they apprehend themselves to stand in relation to whatever they may consider the divine".
- 6) Mathew Arnold defines religion as "nothing but morality touched with emotion".
- 7) James Martineau: "religion is a belief in an ever-living God and finding God. Its aspiration is to discover the infinite, the Absolute, the One, the Divine who is all these things and yet no abstraction but a Being".
- 8) Sri Aurobindo observes that "in most essence of religion... is the search for God and finding God. Its aspiration is to discover the infinite, the Absolute, the One, the Divine who is all these things and yet no abstraction but a Being".

Although, in all the above definitions there is no perfect definition of religion yet each definition brings out one or other essential feature of religion. In every definition of religion, there is a reference to “Power” or “Divine”, which is our ultimate concern. It may also be observed that according to thinkers like Mathew Arnold, religion is a matter of morality. A good definition of religion is possible only when a cognizance of its important aspects is taken. Generally, it is a process which has two sides, an inner and an outer – according to inner aspect; it is a state of belief and feeling, an inward spiritual disposition. Form the outer side it is an expression of this subjective disposition in appropriate acts. Both these aspects are essential to the nature of religion, and they act and react on one another in the process of spiritual experience. There is “worshiping” and “religious commitment” in practice of any religion. Prior to this, there must be belief in the existence of a ‘Higher Power’ without which there cannot be true worship. This belief is a must so that worshipped Being is capable of supplying the needs. Higher powers are worshipped with the intention of having a relation with them. There arises our faith in these powers, out of the sense of need. Feeling, belief and will – these three together constitute religion both in the lowest and highest form of civilization. The key notes of all religion are the feeling of the Infinite, the bowing down before the incomprehensible, the yearning after the unseen love of God, and oneness with Him.

- FEATURES OF RELIGION

Religion plays a vital role in human society, shaping people’s beliefs, guiding their values, and influencing cultural practices. It provides individuals with a sense of purpose, moral guidance, and a connection to the divine. While different religions have unique practices and doctrines, they share certain essential features that define their role in society. The following are the key characteristics of religion:

- 1. Belief in a Supreme Being or Supernatural Power: A defining feature of religion is the belief in a higher power, deity, or supernatural forces. This can manifest as monotheism, where faith is placed in a single deity (e.g., Christianity, Islam, Judaism), or polytheism, which acknowledges multiple gods (e.g., Hinduism, ancient Greek and Roman religions). Certain religions, including some branches of Buddhism, emphasize spiritual awakening and universal truths instead of devotion to a specific god or deity.
- 2. Sacred Writings and Religious Teachings: Most religions have foundational texts or oral traditions that provide guidance on spiritual beliefs, ethical conduct, and rituals. These texts are often regarded as divinely inspired and serve as the basis for religious laws and moral principles. Examples of sacred texts include the Vedas (Hindus), Bible (Christians) the Quran (Muslims) and the Tripitaka (Buddhists). In some cultures, oral traditions and folklore also play a significant role in passing down religious teachings.

3. Religious Rituals and Worship Practices: Rituals are central to religious life, serving as expressions of devotion and means of communication with the divine. These practices include prayers, meditation, fasting, ceremonies, offerings, and pilgrimages. Religious observances can be personal or communal, performed at places of worship such as temples, churches, mosques, and synagogues. For example, Muslims perform daily prayers (Salah), Hindus conduct pujas, and Christians participate in sacraments like baptism and communion.

4. Moral and Ethical Guidelines: Religion plays a crucial role in shaping moral behaviour by establishing ethical guidelines that govern individual and social conduct. These principles define what is considered right and wrong, influencing personal choices and societal laws. Religious doctrines frequently highlight the importance of values like truthfulness, kindness, modesty, and fairness. Many legal systems worldwide have been influenced by religious ethics, shaping laws related to marriage, justice, and social responsibility.

5. Sense of Community and Belonging: Religion fosters social cohesion by creating a shared identity among its followers. Places of worship, religious gatherings, and communal prayers strengthen bonds within communities. Festivals, rituals, and collective worship encourage interaction and solidarity, reinforcing cultural traditions. For instance, religious festivals like Christmas, Eid, Diwali, and Hanukkah provide opportunities for people to come together, celebrate, and reaffirm their faith.

6. Belief in the Afterlife and Spiritual Salvation: Many religions offer explanations about life after death, the soul's journey, and the concept of salvation or enlightenment. Different faiths provide teachings on heaven, hell, reincarnation, or liberation from the cycle of birth and death. These beliefs influence the way followers live their lives, as they often strive to attain spiritual rewards or avoid divine punishment. Christianity and Islam emphasize salvation and eternal life, Hinduism and Buddhism focus on karma and rebirth, while some indigenous religions believe in ancestral spirits.

7. Organized Religious Institutions and Leadership: Most religions have structured institutions and leadership hierarchies that oversee spiritual teachings, rituals, and religious governance. Spiritual leaders like priests, imams, monks, rabbis, and gurus provide guidance to their communities, lead religious rituals, and explain the meanings of Holy Scriptures. These leaders play an essential role in maintaining religious traditions, educating the community, and addressing moral and ethical concerns. Institutions like the Vatican, Islamic councils and Hindu ashrams help preserve and promote religious teachings.

8. Influence on Culture and Society: Religion has a profound impact on cultural practices, social customs, art, music, architecture, and literature. Many traditions, festivals, and rituals originate from religious beliefs and continue to shape social life. Religious institutions have historically contributed to social justice movements, education, and charity work. For instance, principles of non-violence in Hinduism and Buddhism have inspired global peace movements, while Christian missionary efforts have played a role in education and healthcare services.

9. Emotional and Psychological Comfort: Faith provides individuals with emotional strength and psychological support, especially during times of distress, grief, or uncertainty. Belief in divine guidance, spiritual justice, or a higher purpose helps people cope with life's challenges. Religious communities often offer emotional support through prayers, counseling, and social services, reinforcing a sense of hope and inner peace. Many turn to religion for comfort during personal struggles, loss, or crises.

10. Adaptability and Evolution over Time: Religions evolve and adapt to societal changes while maintaining their core beliefs and principles. Interpretations of religious teachings may change over time due to cultural shifts, technological advancements, and globalization. Reform movements within religious traditions, interfaith dialogues, and reinterpretations of sacred texts contribute to the continuous development of religious thought and practice. For example, changes in religious perspectives on gender roles, human rights, and social issues reflect the dynamic nature of faith in modern society.

On the basis of above description, it can be stated that religion is a multifaceted institution that influences personal beliefs, social values, and cultural traditions. It is characterized by faith in a higher power, sacred teachings, rituals, moral guidelines, and community involvement. Additionally, religion provides emotional support, fosters unity, and adapts to changing times. Despite variations across different faiths, the fundamental characteristics of religion highlight its enduring significance in human civilization.

1.3 Forms of Religion

Religion has played a central role in human societies, influencing cultural identities, ethical principles, and social frameworks. Sociologists categorize religion into different types based on its belief systems, rituals and societal roles. Following are the different major forms of the religion:

1. Animism: Animism is one of the oldest forms of religious belief, centered around the idea that all elements of nature including; animals, plants, rivers, mountains and even inanimate objects possess a spiritual essence or soul. This belief system is commonly found in indigenous and tribal cultures across the world. Animistic societies often practice rituals to communicate with spirits, seek their guidance, or appease them for protection. Animism also includes ancestor worship, where the spirits of deceased family members are believed to influence the lives of the living. Many African, Native American, and Aboriginal traditions are rooted in animistic beliefs. In Japan, Shintoism incorporates animism through the worship of kami, spirits believed to inhabit natural objects and landscapes.

2. Totemism: Totemism is a belief system where a specific natural entity, such as an animal, plant, or object, is considered sacred and represents the identity of a community. This religious practice is often associated with indigenous tribal groups, where clans or families adopt a particular totem that reflects their ancestral history and spiritual heritage. These totems are typically regarded as protectors, and members of the group may refrain from harming or consuming the totem species. Rituals and ceremonies are held to honor the totem, fostering social unity and cohesion. The renowned anthropologist Emile Durkheim studied totemism in Australian Aboriginal tribes, suggesting that it is an early form of religion that plays a key role in building collective identity and solidarity within a society.

3. Monotheism: Monotheism is the belief in a single, supreme deity who is responsible for the creation and governance of the universe. This form of religion is characterized by the worship of an all-powerful, all-knowing, and omnipresent God, who provides moral guidance to believers. The major monotheistic religions; Judaism, Christianity, and Islam and share the concept of a singular deity who communicates with humanity through sacred texts, prophets, and religious laws. Monotheistic faiths often emphasize obedience to divine commandments, personal piety, and the afterlife. These religions have historically played a significant role in shaping laws, ethics, and cultural values worldwide.

4. Polytheism: Polytheism is the belief in multiple deities, each with distinct roles, attributes, and powers. These gods and goddesses often represent different aspects of nature, human emotions, or cosmic forces. Ancient civilizations, such as the Greeks, Romans, Egyptians, and Hindus, have practiced polytheistic traditions, where each deity is worshipped through prayers, rituals, and temples. In Hinduism, for example, gods like Vishnu, Shiva, and Durga are worshipped for different purposes, each playing a crucial role in maintaining cosmic order. Polytheism often allows for a diverse and flexible religious practice, where individuals can choose specific deities to venerate based on their personal or communal needs.

5. Pantheism: Pantheism is the belief that the divine is not separate from the universe but is inherent in all things. In this worldview, God is seen as synonymous with nature and existence itself, rather than a distinct personal being. Pantheistic beliefs are found in various philosophical and religious traditions, including certain interpretations of Hinduism, Taoism, and Buddhism. Thinkers like Baruch Spinoza promoted pantheism, arguing that God and the universe are one and the same. This perspective fosters a deep reverence for nature and often influences ecological and spiritual movements that emphasize interconnectedness and cosmic unity.

6. Atheism: Atheism is the absence of belief in deities or divine beings. Atheists reject the notion of supernatural gods, often relying on scientific reasoning, logic, and empirical evidence to explain the universe. While atheism does not necessarily imply opposition to religion, it is frequently associated with secular humanism, which promotes ethics, morality, and purpose without reliance on divine authority. Prominent atheist philosophers, such as Friedrich Nietzsche and Jean-Paul Sartre, have explored the implications of a godless world, emphasizing personal responsibility and existential freedom. The rise of atheism is often linked to modernization, scientific discoveries, and the secularization of societies.

7. Agnosticism: Agnosticism is the belief that the existence of deities is unknown or unknowable. Agnostics argue that human knowledge is limited and that it is impossible to definitively prove or disprove the existence of God. Some agnostics lean toward skepticism, while others remain open to spiritual possibilities. Thomas Huxley, who coined the term “agnosticism,” emphasized the importance of evidence-based belief and intellectual humility. Agnosticism often overlaps with atheism and secularism, as it challenges religious dogma while remaining open to philosophical inquiry.

8. Shamanism: Shamanism is a religious practice in which a shaman—a spiritual leader or healer—acts as an intermediary between the human world and the spirit world. Shamans are thought to possess unique powers that allow them to interact with spirits, conduct healing ceremonies, and lead souls on their journeys. Shamanistic traditions are widespread among indigenous cultures in Siberia, Mongolia, Africa, and the Americas. Rituals often involve drumming, chanting, and trance states to facilitate spiritual journeys. Shamanism is deeply connected to animism, as it assumes that spirits inhabit the natural world and influence human life.

Religion exists in many forms, reflecting the diverse ways human societies seek meaning, moral guidance, and a sense of belonging. Whether through traditional belief systems like monotheism and polytheism or emerging movements like secularism, religion continues to shape cultures, political structures, and social interactions. Understanding these various forms allows sociologists to analyze how religion influences human behaviour and societal development.

1.4 Functions of Religion

Religion has been an integral part of human society, shaping cultures, traditions, and social structures for centuries. From a sociological perspective, religion serves multiple functions that influence individual behaviour, social cohesion and institutional stability. Religion offers ethical direction, nurtures a sense of community, and provides emotional support in times of difficulty. It also helps legitimize societal structures, encourages social transformation, and enhances psychological health. Furthermore, it influences the development of personal identity, economic behaviours and the socialization process. Understanding these functions helps explain the significant role religion plays in maintaining social harmony and influencing societal development in following ways:

1. Social Cohesion: Religion acts as a powerful force in creating social unity by bringing individuals together through shared beliefs, practices, and traditions. It fosters a sense of belonging and collective identity, helping people feel connected to a larger community. Religious ceremonies, festivals and communal prayers serve as opportunities for individuals to interact, strengthen their relationships, and support one another. This unity is especially important in multicultural societies, where religious communities provide stability and social harmony. By creating bonds between people, religion helps maintain social solidarity and cooperation.

2. Social Control: Religion plays a crucial role in regulating human behaviour by providing moral guidelines and ethical standards. Many societies base their legal systems and social norms on religious teachings, influencing what is considered right or wrong. For example, religious doctrines often prohibit theft, violence, and dishonesty while encouraging virtues such as honesty, kindness, and charity. Fear of divine punishment, such as the concept of karma or judgment after death, acts as a deterrent against immoral actions. Additionally, religious institutions often hold authority over individuals, guiding them towards disciplined and socially acceptable behaviour, thus ensuring societal order and stability.

3. Emotional Support: Life is filled with uncertainties, hardships and emotional struggles, and religion provides comfort in times of distress. Whether facing personal loss, illness or social injustice, people often turn to their faith for solace and strength. Religious beliefs offer explanations for suffering, presenting it as a test of faith or a pathway to spiritual growth. Rituals such as prayer, meditation, and religious gatherings provide emotional relief, while the support of religious communities offers a sense of security. Funerals, for example, help individuals cope with grief by reaffirming beliefs in the afterlife or divine justice, reducing feelings of despair and loneliness.

4. Meaning and Purpose: Religion provides answers to fundamental questions about human existence, such as the purpose of life, the nature of good and evil, and what happens after death. It gives individuals a sense of direction, helping them find purpose beyond material pursuits. Many religious traditions teach that life has a divine purpose, encouraging followers to engage in virtuous living, spiritual growth, and service to others. By offering a structured worldview, religion helps individuals navigate life's challenges and uncertainties with faith and hope. This sense of purpose is essential for psychological well-being and personal fulfillment.

5. Socialization: Religious institutions play a vital role in shaping individuals' values, beliefs, and behaviours from a young age. Through religious education, rituals, and family traditions, religion helps transmit cultural values across generations. Children often learn moral lessons from religious teachings, which shape their character and influence their choices in adulthood. Churches, mosques, temples and other religious centers serve as places where individuals learn social roles, responsibilities, and ethical conduct. By instilling discipline and moral values, religion contributes to the socialization process, ensuring that individuals develop into responsible members of society.

6. Legitimization of Social Order: Religion has historically been used to justify existing social structures, reinforcing authority and power dynamics. Many political systems and monarchies have claimed divine authority to strengthen their rule, making it difficult for people to challenge leadership. For example, the caste system in India was supported by religious doctrines for centuries, maintaining social hierarchy. Similarly, religious texts have been used to justify gender roles, economic disparities, and traditional customs. By legitimizing social order, religion contributes to stability but can also reinforce inequality and limit social mobility. However, in some cases, religious leaders have challenged unjust systems, using faith to advocate for equality and human rights.

7. Social Change: While religion often upholds tradition, it can also be a catalyst for social change. Throughout history, religious movements have played a major role in advocating for justice, human rights, and political reforms. Leaders such as Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr., and Desmond Tutu used religious principles to fight against oppression, discrimination, and colonial rule. Religious organizations often participate in humanitarian efforts, promoting education, healthcare, and social welfare. However, religious influence on social change varies, as some religious groups resist modernization and progressive values, preferring to maintain traditional beliefs.

8. Psychological Well-being: Religion has a profound impact on mental and emotional health. It provides a sense of hope, reducing feelings of anxiety, loneliness, and depression. Religious practices like prayer, meditation, and chanting have been linked to lower stress levels and greater emotional resilience. The belief in a higher power or divine plan helps individuals cope with adversity, giving them a sense of purpose and security. Religious communities offer social support, reducing isolation and fostering a sense of belonging. Overall, religion serves as a source of emotional strength, promoting psychological well-being and overall life satisfaction.

9. Identity Formation: Religious affiliation plays a significant role in shaping personal and group identity. It influences an individual's worldview, values, and lifestyle choices, differentiating them from others. Religious identity often intersects with cultural, national, and ethnic identities, reinforcing a sense of belonging to a particular community. For example, being a Muslim, Hindu, Christian, or Buddhist is not just a matter of faith but also a cultural identity that affects daily life, traditions, and social interactions. Symbols, rituals, dress codes, and dietary practices further reinforce this identity, making religion a defining aspect of many individuals' lives.

10. Economic Functions: Religion also plays a role in economic activities by promoting ethical business practices, charitable giving, and financial responsibility. Many religions encourage generosity and social welfare, leading to the establishment of charities, schools, hospitals, and community aid programs. Religious institutions often provide employment opportunities and contribute to the economy through tourism, pilgrimage, and festivals. For example, the Hajj pilgrimage in Islam or the Kumbh Mela in Hinduism generates significant economic activity. Additionally, religious teachings often promote hard work, honesty, and integrity in economic dealings, influencing business ethics and labour practices.

These sociological functions of religion highlight its deep influence on individuals and societies. While religion can unite communities, provide moral guidance, and inspire change, it can also reinforce traditional hierarchies and resist modernization. Its impact depends on how religious beliefs and institutions interact with broader social, political, and economic factors.

1.5 Dysfunctions of Religion

Religion has played a significant role in shaping societies, providing moral guidance, social cohesion, and a sense of purpose. However, alongside its positive aspects, religion also has various dysfunctions that can negatively impact individuals and communities. These dysfunctions manifest in the form of social divisions, justification of inequality, resistance to change, religious extremism, economic exploitation, suppression of critical thinking, psychological guilt, political manipulation, oppression of women, and interference in secular matters. While religion can unite people, it can also create conflict and hinder progress. Understanding following dysfunctions is crucial for promoting a more balanced, inclusive and progressive society

1. Social Division and Conflict: Religion has often been a source of division within societies, leading to sectarianism, communalism, and even violent conflicts. Differences in religious beliefs can create barriers between communities, fostering an “us versus them” mentality. Historically, many wars and acts of violence have been fuelled by religious disputes, such as the Crusades, the Thirty Years’ War in Europe, and ongoing conflicts between religious groups in the Middle East and South Asia. Even in modern societies, religious intolerance can manifest as discrimination, hate crimes, and social exclusion of religious minorities, creating a fragmented society where interfaith harmony is difficult to achieve.

2. Justification of Inequality: Many religious doctrines reinforce existing social hierarchies by promoting the belief that inequality is divinely ordained. For example, the caste system in Hinduism has historically justified rigid social divisions, limiting social mobility for lower castes. Similarly, in Christianity and Islam, certain interpretations have been used to justify slavery, with religious texts cited as evidence that some groups are naturally inferior. Additionally, many religions have imposed strict gender roles that subjugate women and restrict their rights, reinforcing patriarchal structures that make it difficult for women to attain equality in various spheres of life. By legitimizing social stratification, religion can serve as a barrier to social justice and equality.

3. Resistance to Social Change: Religion often upholds traditional values and resists progressive changes, viewing modernity as a threat to moral and spiritual purity. Throughout history, religious institutions have opposed scientific discoveries, such as the Catholic Church's condemnation of Galileo for advocating heliocentrism. Even today, religious opposition to issues such as reproductive rights and gender equality slows down social progress. Many religious communities reject contemporary ideas about human rights, preferring to adhere to doctrines that were formulated centuries ago. This resistance to change can create cultural and generational conflicts, as younger generations seek progress while religious institutions promote traditional ways of life.

4. Religious Extremism: Religious extremism occurs when individuals or groups adopt radical interpretations of their faith, often leading to intolerance, discrimination, and even violence. Extremist organizations such as ISIS, the Taliban and the Ku Klux Klan have used religion to justify terrorism, ethnic cleansing, and brutal acts against those they consider heretics or non-believers. Such radical ideologies reject pluralism and attempt to impose religious laws on entire populations, violating human rights and democratic principles. Even in less violent forms, religious fundamentalism often results in social polarization, where one group views itself as morally superior to others, leading to hostility and division.

5. Economic Exploitation: Many religious institutions amass significant wealth through donations, offerings and state-sponsored funding, often at the expense of their followers. In some cases, religious leaders exploit believers by demanding financial contributions in exchange for blessings, miracles, or promises of salvation. Scandals involving televangelists, fraudulent "faith healers," and corrupt religious organizations have revealed how some religious figures manipulate people's faith for personal gain. Additionally, some religious groups accumulate vast landholdings and financial assets while their followers remain in poverty. This economic disparity raises ethical concerns about whether religious institutions genuinely serve the public or merely benefit from their influence.

6. Suppression of Critical Thinking: Many religious teachings discourage questioning, skepticism and scientific inquiry, emphasizing faith and obedience over rational thought. In some societies, religious dogma takes precedence over evidence-based knowledge, leading to the rejection of science and technology. Historical examples include the persecution of intellectuals like Galileo and the opposition to Darwin's theory of evolution. Even today, certain religious groups resist scientific advancements such as stem cell research, vaccinations, and climate change awareness, arguing that they contradict religious beliefs. By discouraging independent thought and critical analysis, religion can limit intellectual development and hinder progress in fields like medicine, education, and technology.

7. Psychological Guilt and Fear: Many religions instill fear and guilt in followers through doctrines centered on sin, divine punishment, and the afterlife. Concepts such as hell, karma, and eternal damnation create psychological burdens that can lead to anxiety, self-doubt, and low self-esteem. Strict moral codes imposed by religious institutions may cause individuals to feel unworthy or sinful for natural human behaviours, such as questioning faith, experiencing sexual desire or seeking personal happiness. This psychological manipulation can make followers dependent on religious guidance for emotional security, discouraging them from making independent moral choices. In extreme cases, individuals may suffer from religious trauma, experiencing guilt and fear long after leaving a faith community.

8. Political Manipulation: Religion and politics have long been intertwined, with religious institutions often influencing government policies and leaders using religious rhetoric to maintain power. In many countries, religious leaders endorse political candidates, shaping public opinion and elections. Governments, in turn, exploit religious sentiments to justify laws and policies that restrict personal freedoms, such as banning abortion or enforcing religious dress codes. The rise of religious nationalism, as seen in India, the U.S., and some Islamic states, blurs the line between religion and governance, leading to biased policymaking that favours one religious group over others. This manipulation undermines secularism and democracy, as laws and policies become influenced by religious ideology rather than public welfare.

9. Oppression of Women: Many religious traditions have patriarchal structures that limit women's rights and reinforce gender inequality. Religious texts and interpretations often prescribe strict roles for women, dictating how they should dress, behave, and participate in society. In many conservative religious communities, women are discouraged or outright forbidden from becoming religious leaders, receiving higher education, or making decisions about their own bodies. In certain societies, harmful practices like child marriage, female genital mutilation, and honour killings have been defended using religious reasoning. Even in progressive countries, religious opposition to women's rights continues to influence policies on reproductive health, equal pay, and workplace discrimination.

10. Interference in Secular Matters: Religious institutions often seek to influence government policies, education systems, and healthcare, sometimes prioritizing religious teachings over scientific reasoning. For example, in some countries, religious groups lobby against sex education in schools, leading to misinformation and increased rates of teenage pregnancy and sexually transmitted infections. Similarly, religious beliefs shape debates on issues such as euthanasia, contraception, and same-sex marriage, often resulting in policies that restrict individual freedoms. In extreme cases, religious laws, such as Sharia law in some Islamic countries or biblical laws advocated by certain Christian groups, are imposed on entire populations, leading to legal discrimination against non-believers and marginalized communities. This interference challenges the principles of secularism and the separation of religion from the state.

While religion has historically provided moral guidance, social cohesion, and a sense of purpose, it also has significant dysfunctions that impact individuals and societies. When taken to extremes or manipulated for power, religion can foster division, justify inequality, suppress free thought, and hinder progress. Recognizing these dysfunctions allows for a more balanced and critical approach to understanding religion's role in shaping human societies.

6 Sociological Perspectives on Religion

Before delving into sociological viewpoints on religion, it's crucial to outline three key sociological perspectives:

1. Functionalist Perspective: The functionalist perspective draws heavily from the ideas of Herbert Spencer, Emile Durkheim, Talcott Parsons, and Robert Merton. It posits that society operates like a well-oiled machine, with various interconnected components working in tandem to uphold a state of equilibrium. For instance, social institutions such as the family play crucial roles in nurturing and socializing individuals, which are vital for society's continuity. Education serves as a conduit for passing down skills, knowledge, and cultural values to the younger generation. Political structures govern societal members, while economic systems oversee the production, distribution, and consumption of goods and services. Religion offers moral guidance and serves as a platform for spiritual worship. Functionalist theory underscores the interdependence of these societal elements, highlighting how they mutually influence one another.

2. Conflict Perspective: The conflict perspective finds its roots in the foundational writings of Karl Marx. Unlike the functionalist viewpoint, which sees society as a harmonious system of interdependent parts, the conflict perspective posits that society consists of disparate groups vying for power and resources. Through this lens, social phenomena are interpreted by examining which groups wield power and gain advantages within a given societal structure.

3. Symbolic Interactionist Perspective: Macro sociology, as delineated by both the functionalist and conflict perspectives, delves into the broader societal framework, examining how social issues intersect with institutional dynamics. Conversely, symbolic interactionism offers a micro-level analysis, focusing on the intricate interpersonal dynamics within small groups. It underscores the notion that human behaviour is shaped by the symbolic meanings and interpretations crafted through social interactions. The roots of symbolic interactionism can be traced back to the pioneering contributions of sociologists and philosophers like George Simmel, Charles Cooley, George Herbert Mead, and Erving Goffman.

1.7 Composition of Religion

Most of the human population on earth have a strong belief in spirituality or super power or commonly they belief in GOD which is basically we call religion. Studies by scholars have confirmed that more than 4000 varieties of religion exist on planet earth. However, we only count the major religions which we commonly see around us or which have got a large following. Some of the major religions on earth are – Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism etc.

Christianity is the largest followed religion on earth. It is followed by Islam, Non-Religious, Hindus and so on. It is interesting to note that though Christianity is the largest followed religion on earth but it will gradually be surpassed by Islam because the followers of Islam religion is growing very fast. It has been found that every muslim women has 2.9 children per head which is highest among any other religion.

Let's discuss some important religion in detail:

1) Christianity: This religion is centered on Jesus Christ. It is a monotheistic religion that is having only one God. It became the state religion of the Roman Empire and got popularity in European continent. But in the present time the followers of Christianity are declining in Europe and increasing in North America, South America etc.

2) Islam: It is also a monotheistic religion which is being started by Prophet Muhammad who said himself to be the messenger of GOD OR ALLAH. It started in the present-day Saudi Arabia. His teachings were collected in Quran. He started his journey of religion from a place called the Mecca where he was severely criticized and later, he gathered his follower from Medina and spread the religion to every corner of the World.

3) Non-religious: This group of people do not have faith in any religion. They are secular in nature.

4) Hinduism: It is believed to be the oldest religion but it has no clear founder. It dated back to the Vedas. It is a religion having numerous deities and gods. This religion has got so many reformations and modifications in its entire course of evolution. It is concentrated in its distribution and mainly found in India, Nepal etc.

5) Buddhism: This was founded by Siddharth Gautama more than 2500 years ago in India. There are about 470 million followers of this religion. It is mostly followed in East and South East Asia. These religious beliefs in Noble truth which explains the causes of ones worries and sufferings and also the ways to mitigate them.

6) Judaism: It is a monotheistic religion. They believe their god communicates through prophets and reward good deeds while also punish evil. They worship in holy places called the synagogues and their spiritual leader is called rabbis. The sixpointed star of David is the symbol of Judaism. Most of the followers are found in United States and Israel.

1.8 Beliefs and Rituals

Beliefs and rituals have always been the main focus of anthropologists to study and understand society that how and what they reveal about political, social and aesthetic aspects of societies and cultures. We study beliefs and rituals not only to know the meaning and significance, but also to know the effects they have on the lives of their participants and how they influence their thoughts and activities. Both beliefs and rituals can be found in every society because these two elements are embedded in the culture and structure of society. Every society possesses beliefs. Beliefs and rituals vary from culture to culture, time to time and society to society. One ritual which is considered as sacred in one region might not be considered as sacred in another region. Variations can be observed easily across the world. To understand the reason behind their existence is quite a difficult task. Supernatural forces are discussed in different ways in different places. One must look for the differences & the similarity among them. Explaining the unknown with the help of unknown is the goal.

BELIEFS

Broadly speaking belief in supernatural forces/power, symbolic expression of feelings and rituals performed by individual and groups explains the pattern and the reason for particular behavior of some people at some occasion in every society. Many a times belief and ritual help in finding the universal questions like nature of humans, nature of universe, relationship between humans and the universe, nature of death, life after death, reincarnation & transcendental world. People assume a kind of world they live, in which forces or elements are controlling it and what is the position. Beliefs and rituals should always be studied with other social institutions to get a holistic, universalistic & comparative understanding. Belief is embedded in aspects of everyday life and ritual is core of religious belief. Religion is a unified system of beliefs and practices, which unite into one single moral community. Every religion is comprised of beliefs, rituals, symbols, organization and feelings & emotions.

Belief was found from Homo sapiens (who lived 60,000 years ago), burial pattern, graves revealed the presence of rituals at that time, because remains of food, tools, objects that were essentially required of everyday life was kept along with the dead which probably implies a belief which shows a need for after life. Various symbols, at the entrance of hut or rock shelter, rock paintings and prehistoric art show a belief in practicing some rituals to protect themselves from evil powers. Anthropologists looked at why belief and ritual is found in all societies and how and why it varies from society to society. Some believe humans created religion and rituals, whereas some believe religion is prior to humans. With the need for intellectual understanding, reversion of feelings, anxiety and uncertainty and need for community, humans created these elements like belief, rituals, customs, ceremonies and religious practices.

A number of hypotheses regarding the origins of belief, rituals and religious practices have been developed by scholars of anthropology. They have tried to study these elements with respect to other social institutions like polity, economy, kinship, marriage and family etc. they studied belief & ritual in two-stage operation, first analyzing the system of meanings embodied in the symbols which make belief and religion proper and second, the linking of these systems to social-structural and psychological processes.

In the late nineteenth century, one of the earliest evolutionists proposed a theory of the origin of religious belief was Sir Edward Burnett Tylor (1871). In his view the most primary form of religion was animism. He suggested that religious belief oriented in people's speculation about dreams, trances, and death. He thought that there was a dual existence of all things- a physical, visible body and psychic, invisible souls. Soul leaves the physical body at the time of death. Even though the death occurs but souls continue to live on. Souls were the earliest form of religion. He used the term animism, a belief in the existence of souls, spiritual beings or spirits. This view reflected the intellectual component not the emotional component therefore faced criticism. He also suggested that early humans devised the notion of spirits to explain the images of people they encountered in their dreams and trances. He said every simplest religion to most complex religion had some animistic belief. Belief in spirits is fundamental to the concept of animism and provides the basis of later forms of religious beliefs. Explaining the evolutionary ladder of religious belief, his views were animism in the starting point then spirits took greater power and authority and eventually became deities. Non-human entities or elements (animals, plants, and inanimate objects or phenomena) possess a spiritual essence. Tylor redefined animism in his 1871 book Primitive Culture, as "the general doctrine of souls and other spiritual beings in general". It includes a belief that natural objects other than humans have souls. Eventually this process of evolution transformed animism into polytheism then to monotheism. Polytheism is the belief in the existence of many gods like in Shinto tradition. Monotheism is the belief in only one God like in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam includes one supernatural being.

- Different Types of beliefs

Gods are anthropomorphizing, attributing human characteristics, motivations to non humans particularly supernatural events. The name god is given to the spirit or being who is worshipped as the creator and ruler of the world and the one who has power over nature or world. Monotheistic religion: members believe in one God, like in Christianity and Islam. Polytheistic religion: members believe in many gods. Some believe gods are anthropomorphs like human having a face, body, limbs, whereas some believe god has no form.

Spirits are the part of you which is not physical, and is invisible that consists of your feeling. Gods and spirits may be predictable and unpredictable aloof from or interested in human affairs, helpful or punishing. Some believe they can connect to spirits by practicing some actions. The manner to approach to the supernatural varies from one to other like requesting, praying, pleading, fasting, sacrificing, etc.

Spirituality is any kind of meaningful activity or blissful experience. It aims to recover the original shape of man, image of God. Like in Judaism the Torah, in Christianity Christ, in Buddhism Buddha and in Islam Muhammad.

Ghosts- Spirit of a dead person that someone believes they can see or feel. Some communities like of northern Ghana, sisala believe in ancestor ghosts who take care and protect their community from bad things and punish them who violate rules or norms of behavior. Belief in ghosts is universal.

Deity is a god or goddess. There are family deities in many caste groups of Hindu. Like some groups have family deities as lord Krishna, lord shiva whom they worship individually and collectively with family.

Divination, an art or practice of discovering what will happen in the future using supernatural means. It seeks practical answers from supernatural about anything like decisions to be made or curing illness. Diviners use a variety of methods like tarot cards and alter conscious mind.

Magic is a system of supernatural belief that involves the manipulation of supernatural forces for the purpose of intervening the human activities and natural events. When people believe that their actions can compel the supernatural to act in a particular and intended way, it is known as magic. Supernatural creatures or forces are believed by some people to exist or happen, although they are impossible according to scientific laws.

Totemism- a belief in which each human is believed to possess a spiritual connection with another physical being like animal or plants, these are often called as spirit-being or totems and serve as their emblem or symbol. For example, in Orissa there is a tribe Bondo in which two phratries are there who have their different totems tiger and cobra. The people of one clan can never imagine of hunting or killing their clan totem.

Shrine is a place where people visit and treat with respect, worship that place that is associated with a particular holy person/object. Like in Toda of Nilgiri hills have matrilineal shrine. Satanists are individuals who believe and worship the devil.

Superstition is any belief or practice which is explained by supernatural causality, and is in contradiction to modern science. Belief and practices that are considered as superstition by some people might not be considered the same by others.

Characteristics of Belief

- Belief of a person or a people forms the basis of behavior of an individual or group or community. Some believe ancestor-spirits protect them and punish them if they violate rule of behavior. Whereas some believe one should punish their enemies, who have had done something wrong to them. They themselves punish enemies by harming them (sorcery and witchcraft).
- It shapes human's life and the surrounding environment.
- Belief is fundamentally an inner condition, a psychological state.
- Belief sometimes is the key determinant of the status or position of what it is and where it stands in society and in individual's life.
- Belief brings distinctive nature between two groups. There are Latin Christians, Syrian Christians and the Protestants. All three differ from each other by the beliefs they hold.
- Belief is flexible, structured or anti-structured
- Belief is central to all religions. Hinduism, Christianity, Islam, Buddhism, Jainism, etc. Beliefs are more or less similar. But there are similarities and differences in belief among these religions. For example, Judaism shares some similarities with Islam. The Torah, teaching of the law stands at the core or central of Judaism. But there is difference among these two religions. In Islam, parallel is closer: the "five pillars" of Islam- witness to God and his prophet come close to being a credo and some formal creeds. The duties of relationship, practice of ritual, following of Islamic custom, and the observance of Islamic law are some beliefs of Islam.

Example, Fundamental aim of Jain faith is to perfect the soul by following the teachings of the Jinas which reveals the essential truth of the universe and provide guidance to reach liberation through the cycle of rebirth. Jains believe and live by the principles of the most recent Jina, Mahavira. Jain believes in soul, karma and knowledge. Knowledge is required to recognize the delusions of world. With this, the highest type of knowledge, truth of universe is known. Non-violence is the most underlying principle of Jainism.

Functions of Belief

- Belief transforms signs to meaningful symbols which assures mystical providence. And forms a design or framework by founding social drama.
- Belief put a high worth on the human person, both as flesh (visible physical body) and spirit (invisible form).
- Belief magnifies the value of life by making its conservation and renewal into a cult (a group with its own beliefs, rituals and practices which might be an anti social group).
- It acknowledges the material domain under spiritual authority.
- Belief may/may not include a structure, a fixed order.
- Belief includes discipline to subdue egotistical man to a sacred, continuing motive.
- Belief expresses a philosophy of assent to life's terms.
- Beliefs inculcate attitude and personality. The major cults inculcate a sense of mystery through the use of symbolisms pointing to ultimate or metaphysical realities that are known by their signs.

RITUALS

Ritual is a religious service which involves a series of actions performed in a fixed order. In other words, a ritual is a way of behaving as per prescribed or established form of religious ceremony. It is observance of a set form or system of rites as a part of public/private worship. Rituals are practices, services or procedures done as rite, especially at regular intervals in set precise manner. Religious rituals reinforce the basic tenets of religion. When rituals make people feel good, they reinforce the belief that their religion is the correct one. Religions have their own rituals attached to their beliefs. Some rituals across religions (like fasting) are specific to one religion while others are practiced throughout. Ritual gives shape to emotions and helps humans come to terms with the major events of life. They have generally been seen as indispensable in deepening spiritual insight. The repetition of rituals instils religious values and attitudes in the lives of the worshippers. Rituals motivate and move us. Through ritual we build families and community, we make transitions and mark important events in our lives, we express ourselves in joy and sorrow, and perhaps, most importantly, we create and sustain identity. Our ancient ancestors used the bond of rituals to create ties of kinship necessary for survival in a world full of dangers.

Rituals formed structure and hierarchy and helped define their places in the world, which in turn led to early forms of worship such as totemism, animism, and paganism. (modern religious movement incorporating beliefs or practices from outside the main world religions, especially nature worship). "Modern paganism includes a respect for mother earth" In increasingly secular times, we may no longer need rituals for our physical survival, but it still remains essential for our mental, emotional and spiritual well-being. Rituals are expressions of culture. Ritual keeps us aware of the meaning of who we are. In times of transition, loss, disconnection and loneliness, rituals offer transformative power. It can provide a language for expression, stability and serve as an integrative force in community, mediate tradition, and offer emotional support. Rituals survived criticisms (from perspective of rationality, progressive knowledge, science etc.) They do continue to play an important role in human life. We continue to have rituals of healing, rituals to mark rites of passage such as attaining puberty, or getting married, deathrituals etc.

Rituals are ingrained in the spiritual belief system. As rituals have their roots in religion, they are agents of controlling our behavior in community and through which develop the sense of belongingness. Metaphorically, rituals are extremely important. A time to rest, replenish and restore ourselves on our long and winding path through life. Rituals help us to re-evaluate our journey thus. and to reaffirm that the path we are following is the right one for us. Rituals remove us from the ordinary space and time and place us in the sacred space. Even in the world of reason/science, rituals give our lives a sense of meaning and purpose. The terms sacred (the transcendent realm) and profane (the realm of time, space and cause and effect) have remained useful in distinguishing ritual behavior from other types of actions the belief systems, myths and the line are viewed as expressions of the nature of the sacred realm in which ritual become the determining the conduct of the individual in a society expressing a relation to the sacred and profane. Rituals are characteristically symbolic in relation to its reference. Ritual is often described as a symbolic expression of actual social relations, status or the role of individuals in the society.

Characteristics of Rituals

- Formalism: ritual uses a set of expressions in an organized and limited manner; anthropologists call it "restricted code". Example, use of Latin in a Tridentine Catholic Mass. There are certain formal things that gives ritual a restriction code such as use of particular language while reading the holy book like Bible or Quran or Bhagvad Geeta or while reciting phrases or prayers, mantras. Restriction like a fixity of order, louder, intonations, oratorical style, etc. Formalism is followed and brings compliance and acceptance among the communities.
- Traditionalism: rituals follow tradition and generally repeat the historical actions, practices. A good example is of American thanksgiving dinner which is based on early puritan settlement of America.

Rituals reflect tradition, history and shows how humans have adapted, modified and absorbed these rituals. Performing rituals show historical transmission and changes in traditional practices.

- Invariance: rituals are invariants marked by bodily discipline. For example, in monotheistic religion, prayers are performed in union or in groups. We can see in churches a day before and on the day of Christmas, good Friday and Easter or in mosques, men who follow Islamic religion gather there and pray together with discipline or in temples at certain festivals like shivratri, janmashtmi or during jagran people pray in groups or individually perform rituals.
- Rule-governance: rituals are sometimes governed by rules that impose rules, norms on the behavior which defines the outer limits of what is in order. A legitimate communal authority is evoked by customs approved by individuals in community. In some societies fighting or violence is not conducted in wars.
- Sacral symbolism: activities based on the belief in gods or supernatural beings are considered as rituals like in religious belief practices. It requires a human response who expresses generalized belief in the existence of the sacred beings. Symbols, sign, objects become sacred through a process. People identify these things as sacred symbols which are an identity of any religion, country or nation. Example, flag, specific folding, saluting and raising the flag represents a nation which shows it should not be treated as a piece of cloth. Example are symbols or sign or objects or holy book of religion that gives people a religious feeling when they see it like in Christianity or Islam.
- Performance: it creates a frame around the activities, symbols and events which shape the order/pattern. It is said that until there is performance, ritual is socially meaningless. Not only is seeing or believing but doing too. Performance is clearly observed in all types of rituals. Rituals are determinants of all known human societies and cultures which include worship rites, sacraments of organized religions and cults, rites of passage, atonement, purification, rites, oaths of allegiance, dedication ceremonies, coronations and marriage, presidential inaugurations, funerals, traditions, ceremonies and customs.

Different types of Rituals

Rituals can be of more than one type. Rituals are performed or practiced by people to protect their village from crisis, illness, bad luck, omens, drought, scarcity of food and water, gynecological troubles, difficulties and severe physical injuries. Some believe rituals are formed by supernatural powers like gods or goddesses, if not performed in prescribed manner likely chances are there for the occurrence of bad things either to individual or to the whole group or community. There are no obvious types of rituals but those ritual types which are commonly seen:

- ✚ Contingent rituals: it can be subdivided into life-crisis ceremonies, performed at birth, puberty, marriage, death to demarcate the passage from one state to another in the individual or group's life cycle. These rituals are performed to placate or exercise preternatural forces (preternatural abilities or qualities are very unusual in a way that might make think that unknown forces are involved) for protection, safety and security in a meaningful manner.
- ✚ Seasonal rituals: rituals may be seasonal or climatic depending on the crops, availability of food, water, pastures, and resources. For example, pastoralists still practice religious rituals before selecting pastures or breeding of their animals. Shifting cultivators still follow the rituals prescribed from earlier times, like performing rituals before selecting a plot, before cleaning up the land, before burning the land, before sowing seeds and weeding, before harvesting and fallowing. These people perform rites by taking care of direction of wind, sun, moon, lunar or solar eclipse, etc. culturally defined moment of change in the climatic cycle or the inauguration of an activity such as planting, harvesting, setting up a new hut for shelter or moving from winter to summer or at the time of crisis.
- ✚ Divination rituals: other class called as divinatory rituals, ceremonies, customs that are performed by political, authority to ensure the health and fertility of human beings, animals, crops in their area or territories; invitation into priesthoods devoted to certain duties, into religious associations or into secret societies where the daily offering of food along with libation of deities or ancestral spirits.

✚ Functions of Rituals

- Rituals give social control
- Satisfy psychological needs
- Maintains past-historical essence
- Medium of rebellion
- Gives Structure and anti-structure
- Performs as social dramas
- Gives a form of communication
- Serve a disciplinary program
- Provides methodological measure of religiosity
- Enhances with ritualization
- Performs with religion

1.9 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude, the role of religion in society is complex and multifaceted. It can offer moral guidance, foster community, provide psychological support, and influence political and economic systems. However, it also poses challenges, including potential intolerance, gender inequality, and resistance to change.

2.1 Objectives

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with:

- Conceptual framework of Religion, Magic & Science.
- Elements of Religion.
- Elements, Theories & Types of Magic.
- Relation between Magic & Science, Magic & Religion.

2.2 Introduction

Magic and religion are inter-related in the worlds of E.B. Tylor: Religion is the belief in supernatural. The idea of religion is closely related to magic and science.

We have discussed the constituents of religion in preceding lesson. Here we would only reiterate that religion has its several elements. These elements are in one way or the other related to magic. Before we discuss their relationship, we would, in short, give the elements of religion.

2.3 Elements of Religion

Social anthropologists, particularly the British ones, have generated voluminous data on primitive religion. The data relate to the primitive and tribal people of India, Africa and Australia. The US anthropologists have, however, shown lesser concern on primitive religion. On the strength of the ethnographic data available we present below in this section some of the elements of religion which also characterized religion of several tribal groups:

Durkheim has described ritual as an important element of religion. Ritual is a practice of religion, or say, the action part of religion. Conceptually, ritual is different from religious phenomena or beliefs. Beliefs are ideas or thoughts and ritual is their implementation. At the empirical plane of any religion, primitive or otherwise, rural cannot be separated from religion. Parsons in Structure of Social Action has explained the relationship of religion and rituals in the following words:

The fundamental distinction between religion and ritual is that between two categories of religious phenomena—beliefs and rites—the first is a form of thought, the second of action. But the two are inseparable, and central to every religion. Without knowing its beliefs, the ritual of a religion is incomprehensible. That the two are inseparable does not, however, imply any particular relation of priority, the point is, at present, the distinction. Religious beliefs, then, are beliefs concerning sacred things, their origin, behaviour and significance for man. Rites are actions performed in relation to sacred things.

If a Santhal of Bihar offers a hen to his local deity, it is a ritual in consideration of his belief or thought that the deity has to be appeased to ward off the evils inflicted on the community. Thus, the sacrifice of a hen is ritual and belief in the power of deity is thought. We see that in an empirical situation both belief and ritual work together.

(a) Arousing of Feelings

In order to get consciousness about religion or the existence of belief, some feelings and emotions are also aroused. Fear of God, fear for doing evil things, charity, living a sacred life are all patterns of behaviour which arouse feelings for a religion. Sometimes, however, feelings are also aroused to create terror in the followers.

(b) Beliefs

The edifice of religion stands on the structure of beliefs. The earlier social anthropologists defined religion in terms of beliefs only. Tylor argued that there cannot be any religion without belief. And, what is important about belief is that it cannot be argued; it cannot be empirically proved. It is only a matter of understanding.

In recent anthropological literature, the element of belief in religion is severely criticized. It is said that religion has to be understood in sociological and logical terms. Belief has no existence because it does not stand the test of reality.

(c) Organization

In the early history of religion, we have evidence to say that there was some organization to regulate the activities of a particular sect. Max Weber, who is said to be the founder of modern sociology, observed that all the great religions of world—Christianity, Judaism, Islam, and Hinduism—had some kind of organization. The function of organization was to regulate the activities and functioning of the religion. Christianity has its church which works as a central body to keep the Christians together. Likewise, Hinduism has its four dharmas where Sankracharyas work as head and regulate the activities of Hindus.

(d) Symbols and Myths

Each religion has its own symbols and myths. For instance, church, temple, mosque, flag and a specific kind of dress and worship are symbols of various religious cults. Similarly, there are mythological stories related to each religion. The tribals who believe in animism have their own totems which are reflected in animals, plants and trees. The origin of the clans is also illustrated by mythological stories.

(e) Taboos

In order to differentiate itself, each religious faith has its own taboos. These taboos are related to food habits and way of living. For instance, Jainism professes that its followers should not take their meals after sunset and that they should be strictly vegetarian. The behaviour patterns of the followers are also determined by religion.

In the above list of the elements of religion, a few more could be added. It must be remembered that these elements undergo change and transformation at the local level. New interpretations are also added to the elements with the functioning of various social and cultural processes. Some new elements also appear.

2.4 Magic: Meaning

According to James George Frazer (1922) “Magic is inventory of beliefs and forms of behavior which are not subject to criticism, recheck and elimination”.

According to Beals and Hoijer (1975) “Magic is a body of techniques and methods for controlling the universe on the assumption that if certain procedures are followed minutely certain results are inevitable. It presupposes an orderly universe of cause and effect”.

According to Prof. Keesing (1962), “A magical act is a rite carried out to twist nature in a specific way to satisfy human desire.”

The classification of magical practices most firmly established, comes to us from J. G. Frazer. He found that magical formulae are based on two principles:

- Like produces like; and
- Once in contact always in contact.

He has reduced these principles into laws. The first he calls the law of similarity and the second is the law of contact, or contagion. Basing on these laws, he classified magic into two categories: (a) Imitative or homoeopathic magic and (b) contagious magic. If we make a quick survey of research in sociology and social anthropology, we realize that during the last few decades no empirical study on magic has been made by social anthropologists. Sachchidananda has prepared an elaborate bibliography on rural studies, and to our surprise no study has been conducted on the influence of magic among the Indian tribes. Similarly, the project Peoples of India does not mention anything about this. On the other hand, the textbooks on social anthropology invariably carry a chapter on tribal magic. Clearly, there is a wide gap on what we find today and what is given in the textbooks. It is beyond comprehension as to what makes the textbook writers devote many pages to vivid accounts of tribal magic. Perhaps, the fault does not lie with the textbook writers. The responsibility of including magic rests with the framers of the syllabuses.

Magical practices in India go back to medieval and pre-capitalist society. Magic has a specific role in the evolution of our institutions. Malinowski, Evans-Pritchard and Frazer were evolution lists. It is this evolutionary perspective which led these anthropologists to write about tribal magic. Religion, too, like any other social institution, has evolved through a long process of development. Magic was perhaps the first stage in the evolutionary phase of development of religion. Besides tribals the non-tribal groups who were living in isolation also had firm faith in magic.

The allopathic system of treatment had not come into existence then, and people were perennially becoming victims of varying ailments. They were living in unfriendly environments. There was scarcity, famines, epidemics, and the people had no other alternatives other than resorting to magic.

Malinowski and Frazer who worked among the theatricals reported the role of magic in tribal society in middle of the 19th and 20th centuries. Malinowski's Trobrianders and Evans-Pritchard's Azandes have now taken to modernization. All of them have accepted the modern system of medicine.

In India, the 'civilized' castes also took to magical practices and in some cases, these proved more sophisticated than tribals.' When there was invasion on Somnath temple (Gujarat), the Hindu Rajas invited a group of Brahmins to perform magic so that the invasion could be made ineffective. Even today, we see that when political leaders or elites of high status are in a struggle with death, Brahmins and tantriks are called to perform Mratunjaya Jap—a clear example of belief in superstitions. The point which we want to emphasize here is that magic was not a specific art practiced only by theatricals. The whole subcontinent believed in magical practices. If Frazer and Malinowski mentioned tribal magic, they were only discussing the tribal situation which was found during the medieval and pre-capitalist periods, not only of India but the whole of Europe.

What is Magic?

It is a term that denotes a special kind of behaviour, not necessarily religious, which follows from the acceptance of beliefs in one or another type of supernaturalism. If people believe in animism, they act so as to get certain things done with the help of the spirit beings 'whom they believe to be present. If people believe in mana or animatism, they may act in a somewhat different way in order to effect desired ends with the help of the impersonal sort of power they presume can be tapped. They also assume that certain things will happen inevitably because the power has always operated in that way. If people believe in a pantheon of deities, one or another of 'those deities will be propitiated, sacrificed to, vangled in some way in order to bring about other desired ends. However, the essential characteristic of magic is that its procedures tend to be mechanistic and to function automatically if one knows the proper formula." Religion and magic are alternative techniques. Sometimes, one is supplementary to another.

Anthropologists have defined magic on the strength of their experience in the field, though a ‘few of the definitions are not directly related to empirical observations. However, we would make an attempt here to define magic in systematic way. Let us begin with John Lewis. He says:

“Magic is the technique of coercion by making use of belief in supernatural power. Sympathetic or imitative magic supposes that an action committed upon something that stands for a person or a thing will have the desired effect upon the actual person or thing”.

Malinowski has defined magic in a very precise way as, “Magic is a body of purely practical acts, performed as a means to an end.”

According to Herskovits, “magic is a substantial part of culture”. People often use prayer as a form of worship. A prayer uses words to bring about the favourable intervention of the powers of the universe in the affairs of men. Magic stand in contrast to prayer and this contrast was for the first time attempted by Evans-Pritchard in the discussion of the magic among the Azandes. Herskovits draws his comprehension of magic from Evans-Pritchard and Frazer. His understanding of magic is explained as below:

The charm and the spell are widely spread devices employed in magic. A specific power, held to reside in a specific object, is set in operation by the pronouncement of a formula that, of itself, can wield power. The magic charm takes innumerable forms. It most often includes some part of the object over which its power is to be exerted, or some element that, because of outer resemblance or inner character, habitually achieves the desired result.

Though the definitions of religion given by the anthropologists vary in their form and content, the basic idea is more or less the same. The tribals believe that there is one supernatural power. None can contest it. It is universal. This supernatural power is endowed with ample power which is positive (white) and negative (black) both. The person, who wants to obtain expertise in the art of magic, appeases the supernatural power to make it bestow some power on him. The supernatural thus can be obliged to part with some of its power through certain magical performances. These performances vary from society to society.

2.5 Elements of Magic

Magic is an art and has to be acquired. The practitioner has to work hard to develop the skills of magic. Some of the important elements of magic are given below:

- (1) Tylor has classified ‘the practices of magic. These practices are scientific. The practitioner works as a scientist. For instance, Tylor says that things, which appear similar, are put into one category. For example, jaundice bears yellow colour and gold also has the same colour. Magic establishes relationship between these two because of their similar colour. Bohannan does not agree with this theory. He says that in magical practices no logic of association applies.

- (2) Magic is individual-oriented. A person perceives a thing in a particular way; this perception works in his magical practices.
- (3) According to Malinowski, there is important role of mantras. Mantras have the power to imitate the natural voice and, therefore, for successful result of magical practices mantras are important. Second, the magician explains the present situation in this language and orders for the fulfillment of his desires. Third, the mantras refer to the name of those ancestors who have imparted the magical skills.
- (4) While chanting the mantras the magician continuously does some activities; for instance, he moves his hands, makes faces and gestures. These physical activities are believed to strengthen the power of magic.
- (5) The magician exercises some restrain in terms of diet and sex relations during the days when he engages himself in magical practices.
- (6) Magical practices cannot be done at the discretion of the magician. There are some fixed days which are considered to be suitable for this. For instance, the last day of the dark half of month or amavasya is most suitable for learning and doing magic. Again, the days of Dassehra, particularly Navratri, is good for magical practices.
- (7) Malinowski says that discipline is most important in the practice of magic.

The first thing which is required of a magician is to spell out the objectives of magic. He has to perform them with great caution. A little fault could boomerang on the magician himself. It is because of this that the magician lives a pathetic life in his old age.

- (8) In accordance with the objectives of magical practices the magician makes physical gestures to empower his magic.

Frazer and Malinowski have observed interesting instances about the magical practices among the tribals of Australia and Africa. Nadel has also referred to magic in his description of Nupe religion. Evans-Pritchard gives elaborate descriptions about magical practices and its elements among the Azandes.

2.6 Theories of Magic

Some anthropologists have developed theories of magic. Tylor has very specifically differentiated magic from religion. He has constructed three basic theories of magic which are as under:

- (1) Magic is related to a kind of behaviour which is based on general knowledge.

- (2) Whatever is done by nature, can also done by magic. In this situation people do not differentiate between the functioning of nature and magic.
- (3) If the magic fails, it is considered due to the faulty chanting of mantras or some lapse in the regular life of the practitioner.

Thus, Tylor's theory of magic makes two important points: (i) magic is an ideology, and it has to be relied upon; and (ii) magic is based on logic. If the magical practices were done on these two principles, the results would always be forthcoming. Evan-Pritchard observes that magic and religion are found in all the societies.

In all the societies, there is the influence of magic, science and religion. But the extent of influence is not similar. For instance, if a society lives at a lower level of culture such as that of tribals and backward classes, the extent of magic and religion would be larger. The larger members of this society would depend much on magical practices and rituals. However, if the society has a higher-level of culture, there would be lesser space for magic and religion; and more space for science. In other words, science has a predominant place in advanced societies whereas the backward societies practice more of magic and religion.

Tylor's theory of magic has been improved upon by Frazer. In the literature on social anthropology, Tylor is very well known for his two classical works: Whatever Tylor has propounded in the form of theory in these books has been taken up for discussion and analysis by Frazer. While interpreting Tylor, Frazer gives the theory of the law of sympathy which says that the tribal people look at material things in terms of sympathy between the two similar things. Sympathy is of two kinds: (i) on the basis of outward similarity, for instance, between the colour of jaundice and the colour of gold; and (ii) based on contact. It is on the basis of these two sympathies that Frazer has given three theories of magic: (1) theory of sympathy, (2) theory of similarity and (3) theory of contact.

Frazer's theory of magic believes that when a tribal practices magic, he does it as he has learnt it, and he has nothing to do with the theories of magic and his concern is with the outcome only. It is because of this that Frazer considers magic to be semi-art and semi-science. Magic has two basic objectives: first through magic certain objectives are achieved, and second, some of the unwanted incidents can be avoided. The first objective is called sorcery and the second taboo.

No doubt, Tylor has given certain fundamentals of magic which are found among the tribals. These fundamentals are further elaborated, reinterpreted and recast by Frazer. The credit of dividing magic into sorcery and taboo is another important contribution substantially to this field. His hypothesis is that magic and religion provide political solidarity to a society. Both Frazer and Durkheim look at magic and religion as sources of political solidarity.

2.7 Types of Magic

Students of social anthropology often distinguish two kinds of magic.

1. The first kind which is named by Frazer is called imitative or homeopathic magic.

2. The second is called Contagious Magic.

Describing the two kinds of magic Herskovits writes: Both are held to operate in accordance with a principle of 'like to like' also called a 'principle of sympathy'.

1. 'Contagious' magic: This magic is associated with the law of contact i.e. things once in contact with each other remain forever in association even if the contact is physically severed. Primitives have been found not to use each other's clothing, not for reason of hygiene, but because cloths are regarded as a part of that person's body who wore them first. The main implication of the law of contact is that a part is always associated with the whole to which it belongs or belonged; once a part is always a part. This association is extended to clothing, nail-cuttings, hair-trimming, utensils, personal effects and so on. It is because of this belief that the personal belongingness of the dead is not made use of by many primitive groups but are instead buried or cremated along with the dead body.
2. 'Imitative' magic would, let us say, be found in the performance of a dance in which the simulated killing of an animal was enacted so as to assure success in hunting. Imitative Magic: It is the magic which is associated with the law of similarity i.e. like produces like or that an effect resembles its cause. Following this law, the magical practitioner infers that he can produce any desired effect by imitating it. Imitative magic includes both "white" or beneficial and "black" or armful magic

The two kinds of magic as above neither constitute the entire field, nor are they absent from certain practices to which the term 'religious' is customarily given.

Yet another typology of magic is that of 'black' and 'white'.

1. Black magic is that kind of magic which is always used to do harm in the society. One of the most striking and prevalent form of the black magic is 'the image magic'. Images range from highly concrete and pictorial, doll-like representations of human beings or animals to the symbolic representations. The acts which one performs upon images by imitation are thought to come about in actuality. Thus, burning of effigies is the common form of black magic. It is believed that when the effigy is burnt, its original will suffer like-wise. Black magic has some evil intentions. According to it, the victim is inflicted with some injury. The second type, white magic is beneficent in its intent. In social anthropological literature much emphasis is placed on black magic. "The reason for this is two-fold. There is the challenge to the investigator to uncover what his informants are least willing to divulge. More than this though is the dramatic appeal of black magic for the people themselves. Once a willingness to talk about it is established, informants will dwell on the subject with relish and exuberant detail, leaving ‘white’ magic as something taken for granted.” The horror shows which are presented with different names on television depict several of the practices of black magic. If revenge has to be taken, a magician makes a clay image of the victim and gives it all kinds of pains. These pains, in turn, are experienced by the victim. We have innumerable instances of magic reported from different parts of the world.

2. White magic: The magical ceremony which is performed for beneficial end is known as white magic. Familiar examples are fertility rites to ensure or increase the growth of crops and the successful birth of animals or human being by acts as symbolically depicting bountiful harvests or sexual intercourse, pregnancy and parturition. Like the cave art of the Old Stone Age or totemic rites of Australian aborigines, imitative magic may also be used to ensure or increase the food supply of edible animals. Rain magic involving the imitation of falling rain or flowing water is common among primitive people who subsist chiefly by horticulture. Some tribal groups believe that thunder with its rumbling noise, is the direct cause of rain. Therefore, when they want rains, they go to a hill top, sacrifice a hen or a pig and then start flinging down stones, rocks and boulders down the hill, expecting rain to follow the rumbling noises created by their actions, just as it follows thunder. However, the instances of white magic are very few. This category of magic is also extended to include much of native medicine. Surprisingly, there is prevalence of white and black magic among the literate peoples too. However, the increase in literacy and education, many of the magical practices are going out of vogue.

- Witchcraft

Disease and hardships are common to mankind. To overcome these bodily ailments or social crises people have an inventory of remedies. Premises for the secular practice of medicine, unencumbered by supernaturalism are, therefore, found among all societies. Such knowledge, which of course was empirical and not analyzed in a scientific fashion, was usually available to and utilized by all the people. There were however, innumerable afflictions which people in primitive societies supposed were caused by factors of an non-material kind. The treatment of such ailments required magical procedures, such as returning a poisonous power injected by an evil shaman or magic man into his victim. Individuals who had acquired or inherited or purchased supernatural power and procedures based thereon were asked to help persons supposed to be ill from these non-material causes.

In all societies shamans were only part-time workers engaged in curing people or at some ceremonies for which their power also fitted them. The practice of medicine among the people in primitive societies is thus everywhere characterized by a few actually useful devices and drugs, but incorrect theories as to causation of more deadly ailments and by resort to the supernatural for treatment of the latter.

Each society has its specialists who treat the diseases by their skills. These are called witch doctor, shaman, ozha or bhopa. The shamans or ozhas are those who have the power to detect witches and cure a bewitched person. They profess to be able to look into the future, escape harm, transform themselves and accomplish superhuman tasks.

Evans-Pritchard, who has worked among the Azandes of the southern Sudan during 1926-36, has given elaborate information about witchcraft and oracles. In Azande tribe, any misfortune can be, and generally is, attributed to witchcraft. Azandes consider it to be real. The witch dispatches what he calls the soul, or spirit, of his witchcraft to cause damage to others. The sufferer consults oracles or a diviner to discover who is injuring him. This may be quite a lengthy and complicated procedure. When the culprit is revealed, he is requested to withdraw his malign influence. If in a case of sickness, he does not do so and the person dies, the kinsmen of the dead man could, in future, take the affair to the chief and exact vengeance, or they could make, as they do today, a counter magic to destroy the witch.

Among Indian tribals too the practice of witchcraft is found. A witch can injure anyone by a psychic act and gradually bring about his death. This power arises from a certain substance in the body of the witch. Witchcraft can explain all unfortunate events. It plays its part in fishing, agricultural pursuits, in the demotic life of the village as well as in communal life. Thus, witchcraft plays a prominent role in the total life of the tribal community. If for instance, the maize crop is diseased, it is attributed to witchcraft. If the milch cow dries, it is due to witchcraft.

The occurrence of witchcraft is explained by various causes. Though there is natural causation, but why did the accident happen just when it did and to that particular man? A man is injured by a bullock. Why this man? And why this bullock? Witchcraft is a causative factor in the production of harmful phenomena in particular places at particular times, and in relation to particular persons. If a tree falls and kills a man, that is natural but why did it fall just as he was passing.

An oracle is consulted to determine whether some individual is bewitching another individual. One of the most popular kinds of oracle is the poison oracle. Fowls are taken into the bush and a small amount of poison is administered to them. If the fowl lives, the man is adjudged to be a witch. The witch doctors are not those magicians who cure the ailments. There are other kinds of specialists who counteract magic. The witch doctor is a diviner who exposes witches and a magician who thwarts them. He also acts as a leech, or doctor.

- Relations between Magic and Religion

Magic and religion are very close to each other in their role as tools of adaptation. The following are some points of relationship between magic and religion.

- Magic and religion are both imbued with the mystery of the world.
- Religion seeks an explanation in terms of spirits and gods. Magic does in terms of force. Nonetheless the roles of magician and priest are often combined in one person.
- The art of magician and many religious rituals are meant to create an atmosphere of suggestibility.
- The technique of both magic and religion is ritualistic, the performance of which is governed by a traditional order.
- The veil between the two is very thin. So, a slight change in the formulation of words may convert a magical formula into religious prayer.

2.8 Magic and Science

Tylor was the first who discussed magic as a science. The question that plagued him and aroused his curiosity was that when scientifically religion has no basis, why do tribals practice it? The question was valid and begged an answer. Tylor noticed that the tribals themselves knew that magic was not true even then it had a vital place in their life. He contemplated to answer the question:

- (1) Magic is related to the commonsense behaviour.
- (2) What magic does is actually done by nature also.
- (3) Even when the magic fails to perform a certain action, there is no fault with it; there must have been something wrong in the practice of magic.
- (4) If magic inflicts some injury, there is always counter magic.
- (5) The success stories of magic outweigh its failures.

Tylor argues that the development of magic in a systematic way takes the form of science. The crux of his argument is that magic runs on the principles of nature. Nature is run by positivistic laws, so it is also a science.

Frazer does not accept magic as a pure science. However, he does admit that magic is a semi-science. According to him, magic takes place on the basis of certain logic and rules. Ordinary people do not understand that magic is practiced on rules which are similar to science. People only see its applied aspect. They do not think about the principles which guide the magical performances. For a magician, magic is only an art even he does not understand that these are principles which are solely based on science. In theory magic is based on abstract laws.

Malinowski has worked among the people of the Trobriand islands. He has generated a rich stock of data though he has notarized the question of scientific nature of magic. He takes a functional perspective and says that magic exists in society; people practice it because it has certain functions to be fulfilled. However, he accepts that the methods of magic and science, if not same, are truly similar. Both magic and science work on the logic of cause and effect.

Evans-Pritchard fell in the same line of thinking as Tylor and Frazer. Despite their different approaches all the three agree on the following hypotheses :(1) There is some supernatural power. This power has two faces. Its one face is benevolent and provides salvation to men. The second face of it is ugly and harmful. Science explores the benevolent face while magic the ugly face. Science and magic are the two aspects of supernatural power.

- (2) Ruth Benedict argues that magic is not science. The findings of science are verifiable, whereas the findings of magic are beyond any verification.
- (3) There are constant experiments in science. It has made tremendous progress during the last several centuries; instead of registering any progress, magic is increasingly becoming oblivious. Less and less people show their belief in magic.
- (4) The basis of science is pure logic whereas the major premise of magic is faulty.

- Difference and Relations between Magic and Science

Science and magic are closely related. Both science and magic depend upon mechanistic procedures. The magician must follow the same type of process as is done by the scientist. But whereas the scientist deals with the natural world, the magician deals with the supernatural. Magic and science both assume the existence of non-variant relations and the operation of impersonal causes in a more or less mechanical fashion. In magic there is assumed uniformity of cause and effect such as is postulated in natural laws. Frazer says that the two are essentially the same, the difference being that magic is based on wrong assumptions regarding causal relations. That is why he calls magic the “bastard sister” of science. He holds that science is valid, magic is invalid and false. Therefore, magic is barren. Science is legitimate, magic is illegitimate. Hence magic is not science. At best, it appears as science. In other words, it is pseudo-science. When it becomes true and fruitful, it would no longer be magic but become science.

2.9 Magic and Religion

What is the relationship between magic and religion? The distinction comes with more or less personified beings, but most religious rites contain examples of magical symbolism, and a good deal of magic includes reference to spirits. In fact, it is not really possible to distinguish clearly between magic and religion.

There is a fundamental differentiation in religion and magic. First, the rituals of a religion are public and collective. They affect the people as a whole, absorbing all its energies for the period of magico-religious activity. This gathering together of large numbers of people for sowing, harvest feasts and similar celebrations unites the whole community in a mood of happiness and harmony. It gives solemn and collective expression to the social sentiments of an organized community, on which the constitution of a society depends.

2.10 Let us sum up

The magico-religious rites are not for any celebration but for averting or dislodging the visiting evil. The magical practices relating to hunting have certain rites, which help in the easy killing of the animal. Sometimes, the entire hunting performance is done in a ritualistic dance, wearing some part of the animal's skin. It clearly shows that magic is related to religion. There are field reports from Malinowski and Leach which establish that magic is used for successful attainment of goals. For instance, Malinowski reports that when a fisherman sails on the currents of the sea, he applies magic and believes that his boat would not meet any tragedy. The Trobrianders also practise magic to win the heart of their beloved. Durkheim, who is the founder of the sociology of religion, does not see any difference in religion and magic. For him, both the practices are meant to attain certain objectives.

- Durkheim's religious Ideas.
- Sacred & Profane.
- Church & Cult.

- Priests
- Shamans
- Prophets

3.1 Introduction

Durkheim is said to be the father of sociology of religion. He argues that religion has certain elements and these elements are determined by the society. For him, religion is objective, it is a reality. He further says that religion is not the product of individual.

It is the child of society. When we discuss sacred, profane, church and cult, we would refer to Durkheim and say that these aspects are created by the society. In other words, the things which are sacred for society are sacred in religion; the things which are profane for society are profane for individual. The things which are held in respect are sacred. For instance, coconut and flowers are sacred for the Hindus. These are offered to gods and goddesses. The profane has use value, the cycle, the engine, the factory have use value for society. They are utilitarian. Thus, Durkheim describes all the things of the world into sacred and profane.

3.2 Sacred and Profane: Definitions and Characteristics

Emile Durkheim (1858-1917) explained the positive function of religion for society. His major argument about religion has been incorporated in his book, Elementary Forms of Religious Life. It was published in French in 1912 and was translated in English in 1915. Durkheim wanted to demonstrate the social functions of religion by taking totemism as the test case.

He studied Totemism among the central Australian tribes. He chose to study totemism for two reasons:

1. He considered totemism to be an elementary form of religion.
2. He considered that sacred-Profane distinction arose from the totemic practice.

Features of totemism were unique to itself. Durkheim rejected animism and naturism. Both assumed that religion arose out of primitive people's ignorance about nature. Totemism is a system of beliefs and rites centered on totem. This is very often an animal or a vegetable spice or a mythical ancestor. The totem is the symbol of totem a community/tribe. The totem is sacred and it is held in respect and cannot be approached without proper rites and ceremonies. To approach the Totem, which is sacred, one has to purify oneself both internally and externally. The object at the centre of the totemic religion is the pictorial representation of the animal etc. which is worshipped. It serves as clan-identity. Against the sacred world of Totem lies the profane world. The profane world includes human beings and all that is not related with the sacred totem.

Myths, legends, dogmas and beliefs represent the sacred totem, its power, virtues and relationship with the profane world. The sacred and the profane are entirely different and the lines of separation are clearly demarcated. According to Durkheim, the distinction between the sacred and profane is "absolute". These two worlds are often hostile to each other. He argues that this type of sacred – profane dichotomy is common to all religions. The sacred refers to those collective representations that are set apart from society, or that which transcends the humdrum of everyday life. The profane, on the other hand, is everything else, all those mundane things of our routine everyday life.

- Sacred: Definition

The term "sacred" refers to those aspects of life and existence that are considered divine, holy, or worthy of reverence and respect. It encompasses the spiritual, transcendent, and ethereal dimensions that are beyond the grasp of our everyday material world. Sacred elements often have deep connections to religious beliefs, symbolisms, and rituals, which vary across different faiths and cultures.

- Characteristics of Sacred

- Transcendence: The sacred often transcends the ordinary, representing a connection to the divine or a higher power beyond our comprehension.
- Inviolability: Sacred elements are regarded as inviolable and protected from any profane or impure contact.
- Ritual Significance: Sacred objects, places, or actions often play a central role in religious ceremonies and rituals.
- Communal Experience: The sacred is frequently experienced and celebrated as a collective, fostering a sense of unity and belonging among believers.

Examples of Sacred

- Holy Sites: Mecca in Islam, the Western Wall in Judaism, and the Vatican City in Christianity are revered as sacred places.
- Religious Artifacts: The Holy Quran, the Torah, and the Bible are considered sacred texts in Islam, Judaism, and Christianity, respectively.
- Religious Symbols: The Cross in Christianity, the Star of David in Judaism, and the Om in Hinduism are sacred symbols with profound spiritual meanings.

Profane: Definition

In contrast to the sacred, the term "profane" pertains to elements that are secular, ordinary, and lacking in spiritual significance. The profane encompasses the mundane aspects of daily life, devoid of any religious or sacred connotations. This does not imply that the profane is necessarily disrespectful or negative; rather, it denotes the absence of sacred qualities.

Characteristics of Profane

- Everyday Nature: The profane is associated with routine activities and objects encountered in the course of daily life.
- Lack of Ritual Significance: Profane elements do not hold any particular religious or ceremonial importance.
- Common Usage: Profane objects and language are commonly used without any religious implications.
- Changeable and Disposable: Unlike the sacred, the profane is often changeable and disposable without any inherent sanctity.

Examples of Profane

- Ordinary Objects: Common household items such as tables, chairs, and utensils are considered profane.
- Everyday Language: The language used in casual conversations and daily interactions is considered profane.

- Secular Spaces: Public parks, shopping malls, and workplaces are examples of profane spaces.

3.3 Durkheim's Religious Ideas

Theoretically there are two different though intertwined elements in the Formes élémentaires, a theory of religion and an epistemology. The theory of religion will be dealt with first, as it forms the indispensable connecting link between what has gone before and the epistemology.

There are two basic distinctions from which Durkheim departs. The first is that of sacred and profane. It is a classification of things into two categories, for the most part concrete things, often though by no means always material things. The two classes are not distinguished, however, in terms of any intrinsic properties of the things themselves, but in terms of human attitudes towards them. Sacred things are things set apart by a peculiar attitude of respect which is expressed in various ways. They are thought of as imbued with peculiar virtues as having special powers; contact with them is either particularly advantageous or particularly dangerous, or both. Above all man's relations to sacred things are not taken as an ordinary matter of course, but always as a matter of special attitudes, special respect, and special precautions. To anticipate a result of the later analysis, sacred things are distinguished by the fact that men do not treat them in a utilitarian manner, do not as a matter of course use them as means to the ends to which by virtue of their intrinsic properties they are adapted, but set them apart from these other profane things. As Durkheim says, the profane activity par excellence is economic activity. The attitude of calculation of utility is the antithesis of the respect for sacred objects. From the utilitarian point of view what is more natural than that the Australian should kill and eat his totem animal? But since it is a sacred object, this is precisely what he cannot do. If he does eat it, it is only on ceremonial occasions, entirely set apart from workaday want satisfaction. Thus sacred things, precisely in excluding this utilitarian relationship, are hedged about with taboos and restrictions of all sorts. Religion has to do with sacred things.

The second fundamental distinction is that between two categories of religious phenomena beliefs and rites. The first is a form of thought, the second of action. But the two are inseparable, and central to every religion.

Without knowing its beliefs, the ritual of a religion is incomprehensible. That the two are inseparable does not, however, imply any particular relation of priority—the point at present is the distinction. Religious beliefs, then, are beliefs concerning sacred things, their origin, behaviour and significance for man. Rites are actions performed in relation to sacred things. A religion for Durkheim is an 'integrated (solidaire) system of beliefs and practices relative to sacred things, that is separate and taboo, which unite in one moral community called a church all those who adhere to it.' The last criterion is one which will be dealt with later, as the process by which it has been arrived at cannot be understood without a further analysis of the other criteria.

Actually, Durkheim has given the concepts of sacred and profane in his book The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, first published in 1912. This is perhaps the influential interpretation of religion from a functionalist perspective. According to him all societies divide the world into two categories: The sacred and the profane. Sometimes profane is also called non-sacred. Religion is based upon this division. Durkheim writes:

Religion is based upon this division. It is a unified system of beliefs and practices related to sacred things, that is to say things set apart and forbidden.

In the Elementary Forms of Religious Life Durkheim has defined the concept as sacred as below:

By sacred things one must not understand simply those personal things which are called gods or spirits, a rock, a tree, a spring, a pebble, a piece of wood, a house, in a world anything can be sacred.

Actually, for Durkheim there is nothing about the particular qualities of a pebble or a tree that makes them sacred. Therefore, sacred things must be symbols, they must represent something, to understand the role of religion in society, and the relationship between sacred symbols and what they represent must be established.

- Emile Durkheim, in his work “The Elementary Forms of Religious Life” (1912), argued that the sacred-profane distinction is the defining characteristic of religion.
- He believed this division reflects the separation between the social and the individual, with the sacred representing collective ideals.

• Social Functions

1. The sacred-profane dichotomy helps maintain social cohesion.
2. Sacred elements often reinforce collective values and identity.
3. Rituals transitioning between sacred and profane (e.g., rites of passage) mark important life stages

• Cultural Variations

1. What is considered sacred or profane varies across cultures and time.

2. Some societies have more fluid boundaries between the two realms

• Modern Applications

1. Sociologists like Jeffrey Alexander have applied these concepts to understand “civil religion” and the sacralization of secular ideals in modern societies
2. The sacred-profane framework can be used to analyze phenomena beyond traditional religion, such as nationalism or celebrity culture

In conclusion, the concepts of the sacred and the profane provide a powerful analytical tool for understanding how societies categorize and attach meaning to different aspects of life. This distinction continues to be relevant in studying both traditional religious practices and contemporary social phenomena.

3.4 The Difference between sacred and profane

1. Distinct Nature

The key distinction between sacred and profane lies in their inherent nature. Sacred elements possess spiritual or religious significance, while profane elements lack such associations.

3. Role in Society

Sacred elements play a vital role in religious practices, ceremonies, and rituals, shaping the beliefs and values of communities. In contrast, profane elements are essential for the smooth functioning of daily life and societal activities.

4. Attitude and Behavior

Sacred elements often elicit feelings of awe, reverence, and solemnity, leading to specific attitudes and behaviors when encountering them. On the other hand, profane elements evoke familiar and casual attitudes, often leading to more relaxed behaviors.

5. Impact on Culture

The sacred and profane together shape the cultural fabric of societies. The reverence for the sacred influences art, architecture, literature, and various other aspects of culture whereas the profane, on the other hand, provides a foundation for practical aspects of human existence.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN SACRED AND PROFANE

SACRED		PROFANE
1	Set apart from the profane, extraordinary, inspiring, awe and reverence.	Mundane and ordinary, everyday things.
2	Associated with collective, society and social order.	Associated with individual personal desires and interest.
3	Imbued with a sense of holy, supernatural and divine.	Lacks any special significance or meaning.
4	Separated by the profane by rituals, symbols and taboos.	In contact with the profane on regular basis.
5	Essential for maintaining social solidarity and cohesion.	Not essential for maintaining social solidarity and cohesion.

3.5 The Significance of Understanding the Sacred and Profane

The concepts of the sacred and profane hold immense significance in understanding human behavior, cultural practices, and belief systems. By exploring the interplay between the sacred and profane, we can gain insights into the following areas:

1. Anthropology and Sociology

The study of sacred and profane helps anthropologists and sociologists comprehend the values, norms, and rituals that shape societies. It sheds light on the cultural practices and how they impact the daily lives of individuals.

2. Philosophy and Theology

In philosophy and theology, understanding the sacred and profane aids in the examination of metaphysical questions, the nature of existence, and the human relationship with the divine.

3. Art and Literature

The concepts of sacred and profane serve as profound sources of inspiration for artists, writers, and poets. They offer rich symbolism and themes that are reflected in various artistic expressions.

4. Ethics and Morality

The sacred often forms the basis for ethical systems and moral guidelines in religious and philosophical traditions. The study of these concepts contributes to the understanding of moral reasoning and decision-making.

5. Cultural Diversity and Global Understanding

Exploring the sacred and profane across different cultures fosters a broader understanding of cultural diversity and encourages global harmony and mutual respect. Durkheim is said to be the father of sociology of religion. He argues that religion has certain elements and these elements are determined by the society. For him, religion is objective, it is a reality. He further says that religion is not the product of individual. It is the child of society. When we discuss sacred, profane, church and cult, we would refer to Durkheim and say that these aspects are created by the society. In other words, the things which are sacred for society are sacred in religion; the things which are profane for society are profane for individual. The things which are held in respect.

3.6 CHURCH

In sociology, a "church" refers to an established, bureaucratic religious organization with a hierarchical structure, a universal and often compulsory membership (typically by birth), and a positive relationship with the wider society and state. Unlike a sect, a church is generally inclusive, conservative, and seeks to uphold social order by reinforcing traditional norms. Sociologists like Ernst Troeltsch and Max Weber developed these concepts, which provide an "ideal type" for understanding these large, mainstream religious institutions.

- Key Characteristics of a Church

1. Bureaucratic and Hierarchical Structure: Churches have formal, complex organizational structures with a clear hierarchy and paid officials.
2. Universal Membership: Membership is typically universal and compulsory, with individuals born into the church rather than choosing to convert.
3. Integration with Society: Churches are well-integrated into society and tend to have a positive, often close, relationship with the state or political power.
4. Conservative Orientation: They are generally mainstream, conservative forces that seek to maintain the existing social status quo and reinforce traditional values.

5. Claim to Truth: Churches often claim a monopoly on religious truth and aim to serve the entire society with their beliefs and practices.

Passive Relationship with Members: The relationship between the church and its members can be passive, with less demand for intense personal commitment compared to a sect.

- Distinction from Other Religious Organizations

The church concept is often contrasted with the sect, which is a voluntary, exclusive, and often marginal religious movement that stands in tension with societal values and seeks a more radical spiritual experience. The church and sect are considered part of a broader church-sect typology, a framework developed by sociologists like Ernst Troeltsch to categorize and understand different types of religious organizations.

- Theoretical Perspectives

Functionalism:

From a functionalist viewpoint, churches provide social cohesion, emotional comfort, and help reinforce social norms and values, contributing to social stability.

Marxism:

Marxist theorists view churches as conservative forces that maintain the existing social order and uphold the power of the dominant classes by promoting a "false consciousness" that justifies inequality.

- Evolution of the Concept

In modern society, particularly in the context of globalization and secularization, the traditional characteristics of a sociological church are under pressure. Some churches are becoming less able to conform to the "ideal type" of a universal, bureaucratic, and integrated institution, reflecting broader societal changes and shifts in the relationship between religion and society.

It was Max Weber who initiated to devise categories for the analysis of religious organization. It is important to note that these categories were devised specifically in the context of Christianity. Their applicability for the analysis of other religious traditions is problematic. Max Weber has discussed the dichotomy between church and sect in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. While making differences in church and sects Weber writes:

The basic difference between a church, which was 'a sort of trust foundation for supernatural ends, an institution, necessarily including both the just and the unjust...' and the 'believer's church, which saw itself 'solely as a community of personal believers of the reborn, and only these. In other words, note as a church but as a sect.' Since this distinction was made in a discussion of the Baptists, Mennonites and Quakers it is clear that Weber attached crucial importance to the membership principle as a key characteristic of sects, and he emphasized the sectarian provision that 'only adults who have personally gained their own faith should be baptized.' Much of the later debate about sect development has centered on this feature; and some of the other characteristics that Weber attributed to sects in contrast to churches have also been employed in subsequent research. The observation, for example, that separation from the State characterizes some churches as well as sects, and cannot thus be termed a distinguishing characteristic of sects, and cannot thus be termed a distinguishing characteristic of sects, seems closely allied to the approach of a number of later sociologists. Similarly, the shared though differently interpreted concept of extra ecclesiam nulla salus held by both the church and the sect, which Weber indicated, has been effectively adopted by David Martin in order to contrast the denomination, which has a somewhat less exclusive ethos. The separation from the world which Weber noted in sectarian groups has likewise been given amore extensive analysis in the work of Bryan Wilson.

3.7 SECT

A sect is a relatively small religious group. Its members are usual though by no means always, drawn from the lower classes and the poet Sects often reject many of the norms and values of the wider society and replace them with beliefs and practices which sometimes appear strager to the non-believer. As a result, sects are, in Peter Berger's words, tension with the larger society and closed against it'. Sects are ensuring groups which are largely closed to those who have not gone through the initiation procedures for membership. They institute a strict pattern', behaviour for members to follow and make strong ciaims on their loyalty. Belonging to a sect is often the dominant factor in a member's life. The organization of Sects tends to be in terms of small face to face group, without a hierarchy of paid officials and a bureaucratic structure. Of worship is characterized by an intensity and open commitment which is lacking in many churches and denominations. The Black Muslim sect illustrates many of the above points. It also shows the relationship between the circumstances of its members and the beliefs and practices of these sects.

A sect is a subgroup of a religious, political or philosophical belief system, usually an offshoot of a larger religious group. The word sect comes from the Latin Secta, meaning an organized religious body or organization, oriented towards 'a course of action or way of life'. In other words, A sect is a type of religious group that is distinguished by having broken away from a larger organization. Members of sects are predominantly lower class and have usually attained membership through conversion. The power structure in a sect is informal and leaders are untrained and typically chosen by the members. In relation to other religious organizations, sects tend to be nonconformist and oppositional, although they are less so than cults.

Troeltsch characterised sects as organisations that broke away from a church (through a schism) because they were dissatisfied with its teachings or practices. This would be a small-scale schism with the sect formed by dissatisfied members of a congregation rather than a split towards the top of the hierarchy. Troeltsch said of sects:

- They claim a monopoly over the truth and are often hostile to other religious organisations
- They do not have a complex, bureaucratic hierarchy, instead usually being led by a charismatic leader.
- They are small
- They demand total commitment from members, and therefore are not accessible without significant sacrifices on the part of members
- They are usually hostile to the state and to mainstream society (what Wallis called world-rejecting)
- Often made up of marginalised, deprived groups, such as those on low incomes or from marginalised minority-ethnic groups.
- Sects might include extremist organisations like Jim Jones' the People's Temple or David Koresh's Branch Davidians. These are the sorts of organisations that (outside sociology) we might refer to as cults (see next section).

Troeltsch used the term to refer to small Christian organisations like the early Methodists, Baptists and Calvinists who over the time moved into the mainstream, becoming what Niebuhr called denominations. Sects tend to grow quickly (especially if there is a charismatic leader) but can also decline very quickly. If the sect was built around a leader, then that leader's death can also lead to the end of the sect. Also, if the sect made some specific predictions (for example, the end of the world!) then the prediction not coming about can also lead to the quick demise of the sect.

Founded in Detroit in the early 1930s, the Black Muslims, or more correctly the Nation of Islam, had some fifty Temples in 1959 in low-income Black ghetto areas. The sect rose to prominence in the early 1960s when the Black American movement for self-determination developed. Members are largely drawn from those in poverty; the stated objective of the sect is to recruit the Negro in the mud'. The Black Muslims believe that Blacks are 'by nature divine' and that Whites are inferior and evil by nature. They prophesy that Whites and their religion will be destroyed in the year 2000 and that Blacks will then rule forever 'under Allah's guidance in a 'New World'. On initiation into the sect, members replace their 'slavename' with a Muslim name. They are told; you are not a Negro from this day on. You are now a Muslim. You are now free. Accompanying this identity transformation is a rejection by members of their former life style, of their non-Muslim friends and of lower-class Black society which is referred to as 'the dead world'.

In most large cities the Muslims operate small businesses - barber's shops, clothing stores and restaurants and their Economic Blueprint for the Blackman advocates economic and dependence from White America. The Muslims are encouraged to work hard, save and abstain from luxuries. A strict moral code similar to ascetic Protestantism, which forbids the use of alcohol, tobacco and narcotics, sexual intercourse outside of marriage, dancing, dating and many forms of sport, is imposed on all members. In particular, the responsibilities of the man as husband, father and breadwinner are emphasized. Life revolves around the Temple. Members are either attending services or courses on self-improvement, looking after the welfare of fellow members or recruiting new members.

The early 1960s was a period which promised change and improvement the position of Blacks in America. For many Blacks in the areas of greatest poverty, the Black Muslim sect offered a means to translate this promise into reality. It provided possible solutions to the problems of poverty, unemployment, broken families and the negative self-concept produced by the stigmas of blackness and poverty. Statements by members indicate that sect membership gave them purpose, direction, pride, self-respect and hope for the future.

Max Weber argues that sects are most likely to arise within groups which are marginal in society. Members of groups outside the mainstream of social life often feel they are not receiving either the prestige and/or the economic rewards they deserve. One solution to this problem a sect based on what Weber calls a 'theodicy of disprivilege' (a theodicy a religious explanation and justification). Such sects contain an explanation for the disprivilege of their members and premise them a 'sense of honour' either in the afterlife or in a future 'new world' on earth.

An explanation for the development of sects must account for the variety of social background represented in their membership. Sects are not confined to the lower strata of society. For example, the Christian Science sect has a largely middle-class membership. The concept of relative deprivation can be applied to members of all social classes. Relative deprivation refers to subjectively perceived deprivation, that which people actually feel. In objective terms the poor are more deprived than the middle class. However, in subjective terms certain members of the middle class may feel more deprivation than the poor. Relative deprivation applies to the middle-class hippy in California who rejects values of materialism and achievement and seeks fulfilment in Transcendental Meditation. It applies equally to the unemployed Black American who joins the Black Muslims. Both experience deprivation in terms of their own particular viewpoints. Sects can therefore be seen as one possible response to relative deprivation.

Sects tend to arise during a period of rapid social change. In this situation traditional norms are disrupted, social relationships tend to lack consistent and coherent meaning and the traditional 'universe of meaning' is undermined. Thus, Bryan Wilson sees the rise of Methodism as a response by the new urban working class to the 'chaos and uncertainty of life in the newly settled industrial areas'. He argues that, 'newly emergent social groups are, at least in the, context of a society in which the religious view of the world dominates, likely to need and to evolve new patterns of religious belief to accommodate themselves to their new situation'. In a situation of change and uncertainty, the sect offers the support of a close-knit community organization, well defined and strongly sanctioned norms and values and a promise of salvation. It provides new and stable 'universe of meaning' which is legitimated by its religious beliefs.

- Characteristics of Sect

- A sect is a relatively small religious group. It is an organized body of people developing a kind of religious consciousness and raising as a major critic to mainstream
- Sect is ideologically and operationally closed.
- Its members are usually, though by no means always, drawn from the lower classes and the poor.
- Sects often reject many of the norms and values of the wider society and replace them with beliefs and practices which sometimes appear strange to the non-believer.
- Sect institute a strict pattern of behaviour for members to follow and make strong claims on their loyalty.

TYPES OF SECTS

- Sects in Hinduism

Hinduism has four major sects – Vaishnavism, Shaivism, Shaktism, and Smartism.

1. Vaishnavism

This sect worships Lord Vishnu, and the followers call themselves vaishnavites. The followers give significance to Lord Vishnu and His ten incarnations. Their beliefs and practices that help develop notions such as Bhakti and Bhakti Yoga are based on ancient texts like Bhagavad Gita and the Padma, Vishnu, Bhagavata Puranas and the Upanishads. The sect has enjoyed significant recognition internationally since the mid-1900s through the Gaudiya Vaishnava branch.

2. Shaivism

This sect worships Lord Shiva as their most Supreme Being, and the followers call themselves Shaivas. They have a firm faith that Lord Shiva is the be all and end of all things. The devotees of Shaivism put sacred ash – which in Sanskrit is called bhasma or vibhuti – on their foreheads and other body parts.

3. Shaktism

Followers of this sect are ardent worshippers of Devi or Shakti, whom they consider as the Hindu Divine Mother or the Supreme Brahman itself. The sect has various tantric and non-tantric disciplines spread across the Indian subcontinent and beyond.

4. Smartism

Followers of Smartism follow all Vedas and Shastras and believe that all Hindu deities are forms of the Brahman.

Islam

Islam is the religion followed by Muslims all over the world. They believe in one God called Allah. Though all sects inside Islam pray to Allah, they are different in other aspects. These sects are:

Sunni Islam

The Sunni sect is the largest sect of Islam globally. The followers of this sect are called Sunnis, and they follow ‘sunnah,’ – the tradition and practices of Prophet Muhammad. They consist 85% to 90% of the total Muslim population. They believe that Abu Bakr was the first caliph and Prophet Muhammad’s successor.

Shia Islam

Shia is a derivation of an Arabic term, shi’at ‘Ali. The followers of this sect are Shia Muslims. They believe that Ali was the true successor of Prophet Muhammad, which is different from what the Sunni Muslims believe. This sect is the second largest among Muslims.

• Ismailis or Seveners

- The Ismailis belong to those Shia Muslims who split up in 765 AD over the disagreement of the 6th Imam. The sixth imam was the Ja’far al-Sadiq, and they believe that Ismail, the eldest son of Imam Ja’far, was his rightful successor.
- Zaidiyyah or Fivers

This sect of the Shia community believes the grandson of Ali, Zayd ibn Ali, is the fifth Imam.

Christianity

Christianity is broadly divided into three sects that have their sub-sects. The sects are as follows:

- Roman Catholicism

Roman Catholics believe Jesus is the son of God whose aim was to eradicate sins from earth through his teachings, death and resurrection.

- Protestantism

Protestantism originated in the 16th century, and its followers hold the Bible as the ultimate authority in matters of religious truth.

- Orthodox Christianity

For an Orthodox Christian, Jesus Christ is God himself. They also believe in the incarnation, crucifixion, and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Buddhism

The three sects of Buddhism are:

- Theravada
- Mahayana
- Vajrayana

How did the Concept of Sect originate?

- Max Weber argues that sects are most likely to arise within groups which are marginal in society. Members of groups outside the main stream of social life often feel they are not receiving either the prestige and/or the economic rewards they deserve.
- One solution to this problem is a sect based on what Weber calls a 'theodicy of disprivileged' (a theodicy is a religious explanation and justification). Such sects contain an explanation for the disprivilege of their members and promise them a 'sense of honour' either in the afterlife or in a future 'new world' on earth.
- According to other Sociologists, an explanation of the sects must account for the variety of social background represented in their membership. Sects are not confined to the lower strata of society. For example, the Christian Science sect has a largely middle-class membership. The concept of relative deprivation can be applied to members of all social classes.

- In objective terms the poor are deprived than the middle class. However, in subjective terms certain members of the middle class may feel more deprivation than the poor. Sects can therefore be seen as one possible response to relative deprivation.
- Sects tend to arise during a period of rapid social change. In this situation traditional norms are disrupted, social relationships tend to lack consistent and coherent meaning and the traditional ‘universe of meaning’ is undermined.

3.7 CULT

The concept of “cult” was introduced into sociology in 1932 by American sociologist Howard P. Becker as an expansion of German theologian Ernst Troeltsch church-sect typology. Troeltsch aim was to distinguish between three main types of religious behavior: churchly, sectarian and mystical. Becker created four categories out of Troeltsch first two by splitting church into “ecclesia” and “denomination”, and sect into “sect” and “cult”. Like Troeltsch “mystical religion”, Becker’s cults were small religious groups lacking in organization and emphasizing the private nature of personal beliefs.

Later formulations built on these characteristics while placing an additional emphasis on cults as deviant religious groups “deriving their inspiration from outside of the predominant religious culture”. This deviation is often thought to lead to a high degree of tension between the group and the more mainstream culture surrounding it, a characteristic shared with religious sects.

The term often highlights smaller religious movements or movements involving particularly intense religious devotion. The cult is a voluntary organisation open to all who wish to join or participate in it. According to Johnson, A cult emphasizes one doctrine (above all others) or it focuses upon a God or Goddess with certain definite characteristics.

The word “cult” descends from the Latin “cultus,” an ancient word encompassing the concepts of adoration, education, and cultivation. At first, it became a catch-all term for groups devoted to a specific subject. This could be something philosophical and religious or more mundane and material. By the nineteenth century, it evolved to mean an unorthodox group of zealous and eccentric believers. Still, the definition of “cult” remains somewhat expansive. While it’s synonymous with these sorts of often destructive movements and bizarre forms of belief, it can also refer to an ordinary group of people. For example, a movie might have a “cult following,” meaning it appeals to a niche group of people. This doesn’t imply anything nefarious about the film itself.

Characteristics of a Cult

Each cult has its own distinctive focus, but almost all of these groups share at least some elements in common, such as:

1. Authoritarian control: Cultism hinges on encouraging maximum dependency. People in the cult must feel incapable of living an individual life outside the norms of the group. These beliefs often go hand in hand with a worshipful attitude toward the group's authoritarian leader.
2. Extremist beliefs: Cult members hold to very dogmatic and extreme beliefs. They also are unable to question these belief systems without fear of reprisal or punishment from the leader or other group members.
3. Isolation from society: As soon as new members join a cult, other adherents work hard to isolate them from family members and friends. This helps fulfill the mind control aspirations of the leader. It also creates a hive mind of sorts between the new person and the other members.
4. Veneration of a single individual: Charismatic leaders are often at the center of most cults. Consider the Manson family of the late 1960s. As their name suggests, they adopted the beliefs of their leader, Charles Manson, and fulfilled his requests. The same pattern repeats in almost all other cults, albeit to less violent ends in many cases.
5. A cult, also has a high degree of tension with the surrounding society, but its beliefs are (within the context of that society) new and innovative.
6. Cults are not reactionary or revolutionary but instead are revisionary. Cult does not stand opposite to religion.
7. Cult is a supplementation of religion than being a challenge to religion.
8. Cult's existence is greatly linked to life span of cult leader. He or she is a charismatic person for his followers.
9. Cults are engaged in catering to day-to-day problems of people.
10. Over a period, cult may develop into a sect i.e. Calvinism to Protestantism.
11. In Indian society, according to K.M. Panikkar it was during Mughals rule that sectarian division among Brahmins was greatly glorified i.e. Shaivism and Vaishnavism, because Hinduism was losing its great tradition because of loss of political patronage.

TYPES OF CULTS

There are many different types of cults focusing on different end goals or beliefs. Here are just a few general groupings:

1. Doomsday cults: Certain cults come together to prepare for the allegedly imminent end of the world. For instance, the Branch Davidians stockpiled firearms and explosives in a Waco, Texas, compound over the 1980s and '90s to prepare for the apocalypse. This led to an infamous standoff with the federal government.

2. Political cults: Political groups on both the left and right can morph into cults. Janja Lalich wrote an entire account of her own experience in such an environment.

3. Religious cults: Spiritual beliefs serve as the bedrock for many cults. Some cults are offshoots of mainline religions while others offer brand-new dogmas and theology.

- Examples of Cults

Cults have made headlines over the years due to their outrageous and sometimes tragic behavior. Perhaps you've even heard of some of these notorious cultic groups:

1. Heaven's Gate: Inspired by the Book of Revelation, Bonnie Nettles and Marshall Applewhite formed Heaven's Gate as a doomsday cult with a focus on UFOs. In 1997, all the members died by mass suicide in an effort to ride a comet passing by the Earth.
2. The Peoples Temple: Jim Jones, a charismatic preacher from the United States, formed the Peoples Temple to spread his own flavor of Christianity before moving to Guyana. There, he founded Jonestown, a compound for his religious group of followers. They died by mass suicide in 1978.
3. The Unification Church: A new religious movement that began in South Korea, The Unification Church spread to the rest of the world. All adherents follow the teachings of Sun Myung Moon, hence their colloquial nickname (the Moonies).

✚ Why Do People Join Cults?

People join cult movements for various reasons, most of which revolve around a desire for meaning and community. Many who become part of such organizations have troubled backgrounds and difficulty fitting into society. They might also feel mainstream culture has no place for them and nothing of spiritual value to offer either. Former cult members often describe the long-lasting sense of loneliness and nihilism they felt prior to becoming part of something bigger than themselves. This encourages them to put down their defenses and accept the stranger elements of their new communities. Of course, this has sometimes led to horrific and even deadly outcomes in extreme circumstances.

Anthropologists have worked on the concept of cult. A cult is a set of practices and beliefs of a group, in relation to a local go. In sociology, it is a small group of religious activities, whose beliefs are typically synergetic, esoteric, and individualistic. Although it is related to the concept of a sect, the cult is not in Western society associated with mainstream Christianity. As a scientific term, it is often difficult to dissociate the idea of a cult from its commonsense pejorative significance and it does not have a precise scientific meaning. Cultic practices appear to satisfy the needs of alienated sections of urban, middle-class youth. Cultic membership among young people is typically transitory, spasmodic and irregular. Research societies, cults have proliferated in the post-war period, and are often associated with the counter-culture.

Steve Bruce has mentioned about ‘mysticism’ as a tradition within Christianity in addition to the church and sect. Bruce describes it in this way:

Unlike the other forms this (cult) was a highly individualistic expression, varying with personal experiences and interpretation.

To Bruce, this corresponds to the idea of a cult, which is:

Loosely knit group organized around some common themes and interests but lacking any sharply defined and exclusive belief system.

A cult tends to be more individualistic than other organized forms of religion because it lacks a fixed doctrine. Cults tolerate other beliefs and indeed their own beliefs are often so vague that they have no conception of heresy. Cults often have customers rather than members and these customers may have relatively little involvement with any organizations. Once they have learnt the rudiments of the beliefs around which the cult is based.

3.9 The Concept of the Priest/Priesthood

A priest is a religious leader authorized to perform sacred rituals and ceremonies, acting as an intermediary between humans and a deity. The role of a priest is known as the priesthood. Types of priests vary by religion but often include religious scholars and ministers who conduct services, offer blessings, and provide guidance to their community.

MEANING

- Intermediary: Priests serve as a link between the human community and the divine, performing rites and prayers to ensure the completion of religious ceremonies.
- Authorized Ritual Performer: They have the authority and knowledge to perform religious rites, such as baptisms, weddings, or sacrificial offerings.
- Spiritual Leader: Priests often provide spiritual guidance, counseling, and education, acting as a source of wisdom and support for their followers.

TYPES OF PRIESTS

The specific roles and titles of priests differ across various religions, but here are a few examples:

- ✚ Catholic Priests: In hierarchical Christian churches, a priest is a clergyman who ranks below a bishop.
- ✚ Diocesan Priest: Serves a particular diocese and is available to the people of that region, acting as a spiritual leader for parish communities.
- ✚ Monk Priest: Takes vows to live and work within a monastery, making promises of obedience to the Abbot of the monastery rather than a bishop.

✚ HINDU PRIESTS:

In Hinduism, priests, often from the Brahmin class, strengthen sacrifices and offer prayers.

1. Vaidika (Vedic Priests): Study Sanskrit and perform rituals based on Vedic texts and chanting.
2. Pauranika (Purānic Priests): Perform rituals and chants based on the Puranas and Tantra, a less rigorous path that can include women.

✚ JAIN PRIESTS:

In Jainism, priests are spiritual figures within the religious community.

✚ NEWAR BUDDHIST PRIESTS (VAJRACHARYA):

A specific type of priest within Newar Buddhism.

In most common parlance, the priest is a religious functionary whose role is to administer an established religion - to celebrate the traditional rituals, practices, and beliefs. Two essential features characterize him, namely regular cult, and inherence in a religious institution. Weber explains that "It is more correct for our purpose in order to do justice to the diverse and mixed manifestations of this phenomenon. to set up as the crucial feature of the priesthood the specialization of a particular group of persons in the continuous operation of a cultic enterprise, permanently associated with particular norms, places and times. and related to specific social groups. The first feature implies that, "The main function of the priest ... is cultic... Worship, as the very expression of religious experience, however primitive or rudimentary its form may be, is the main concern of the priest. He guarantees the right performance of formalized acts of worship." The priest mediates between God and humans; he not only interprets the divine will but also regulates and strengthens the relation between God and his fellow human beings. The basis of his existence and authority is a continuous and regular communion with the Divine. "For the priesthood regular ritual (liturgical) observance and a fixed theology are essential. Weber reiterates that there can be no priesthood without a cult, although there may well be a cult without a specialized priesthood because a rationalization of metaphysical views and a specifically religious ethic are missing in the case of a cult without priests.

The second essential characteristic of the priest is his linkage with an organized religion, and legitimization by religious authorities. An extended, cross-cultural description of the priest is, "any religious specialist acting ritually for or on behalf of a community. The priest inheres in a religious organization as a representative of that establishment, and his actions mediate between its traditions and the people. Differing from other related role types, "the priest serves the altar, in the temple or shrine, as the representative of the community in his relations with the gods and the sacred order by virtue of the status and its functions that have been conferred upon him at his ordination, bestowing its sacredness and attendant taboos. Bendix interprets Weber, and reiterates that the priest serves in a holy tradition, and "even when the priest possesses a personal charisma, his function is legitimate only by virtue of a regular organization of worship." About the Levitical priests of Judaism, Brown points out that even "if a man was born into the priestly tribe, he still had to be installed in the priestly office." Often the priest is the official representative of a religion. Greenwood, while affirming that the priest is called to be a witness, says, 'The priest is required personally to be the representative of all the other members of the Jocal church within which she (the priest) presides to the wider community.'

Preparation and education play an important role in priesthood. The systematic training of priests is intended to help them to develop the faculties and abilities required for the performance of cults. It centres in the development and maintenance of the proper communion with the numen, from which the mana or 'sanctity' of the priest's results. While ascetic practices are to bring body and will under the necessary control, meditation and prayer are destined to prepare the soul, and instruction and study to train the mind. History of the development of religions evidences that great systems of knowledge and schools of learning of various disciplines have emerged in association with centres of the training of priests. The rational training and discipline of priests is distinguished from the combination of partly "awakening education" using irrational means and aimed at rebirth, and partly training in purely empirical lores of magicians.

- The Priest and Related Role Types

The identity of the priest may be better comprehended by differentiating it from other related role types. The priest is distinct from the shaman. The term shaman comes from Siberian Tungus noun saman which signifies "one who is excited, moved, raised." As a verb it means "to know in an ecstatic manner." Shaman is a man with "a high degree of nervous excitability" (frequently an epileptic). He is the charismatic<sup>61</sup> figure par excellence - one who actually displays the presence of the sacred while in a state of ecstatic trance. Waston LaBarre writes, "The real difference between shaman and priest is who and where the god is, inside or out."

The Priest is not the magician. The Magician in present-day society is one who makes visible things disappear, or invisible things appear as a means of entertainment. But that has not been the case always. According to Wach, magic connotes forcing the numen to grant what is desired, while religion, with which priests are associated, means submission to and worship of the divine power upon which man feels dependent. Magician's authority is proportionate to his fulfilment of the expectations of his clients. His prestige is less firmly established and more dependent upon his professional 'success' than that of the prophet. On the one hand

Weber observes that in many religions, including Christianity, the concept of the priest includes a magical qualification. But on the other hand, he concurs with Wach in asserting that the priest is a functionary of a regularly organized and permanent enterprise concerned with influencing the gods by means of worship, in contrast with the individual and occasional efforts of magicians who coerce gods by magical means. While the priest operates in the interests of his organization, the magician is self-employed. Moreover, the professional equipment of special knowledge, fixed doctrine, and vocational qualifications of the priest bring him in contrast with sorcerers, prophets and other types of religious functionaries who exert influence by virtue of personal gifts (charisma) made manifest in miracle and revelation.

The priest is distinct from the prophet. The prophet is someone who confronts the powers that be and the established ways of doing things, claiming to be taken seriously on religious authority. Weber finds that "the personal call is the decisive element that distinguishes the prophet from the priest. The latter lays claim to authority by virtue of his service in a sacred tradition, while the prophet's claim is based on personal revelation and charisma. It is no accident that almost no prophets have emerged from the priestly class... The priest, in clear contrast dispenses salvation by virtue of his office. Emphasising the distinctness of prophetic call, Wach opines, "The consciousness of being the organ, the instrument, or mouthpiece of the divine will is characteristic of the self-interpretation of the prophet." Furthermore, Weber distinguishes between two types of prophets: exemplary prophets who point out the path to salvation by exemplary living, usually by a contemplative and apathetic-ecstatic life, and the emissary prophets who address their demands to the world in the name of a god. Naturally these demands are ethical, and often of an active ascetic character. Vernon observes that prophets usually appear during periods of unrest, when the established value systems are being challenged. They find little welcome at peaceful times.

According to Nisbet, the prophet and the magician have certain common features, namely, secret powers and assumption of importance in times of collective crisis or personal difficulty. But they do differ.

But whereas the central function of the prophet is that of interpretation of the sacred tradition and of gaining access to the deity in ways denied the bulk of populace, the central function of the magician is that of effecting exceptions to the natural order... The magician's role is that of the doer - but what he does is reserved for times of crisis and for activities which are affected by risk or uncertainty of outcome. His role is the outcome of special knowledge that he holds to himself and to his legitimate descendant's knowledge that he holds to himself and to his legitimate descendants.

It is not viable either to make categorical distinctions among these role types, or even to grade them in ways universally acceptable to all religions. At any rate, Wach detects the uniqueness of priesthood in the comprehensive nature of the activities of priests. "The institution of the priesthood is inferior to the great types of personal religious charisma, but the priestly is the most comprehensive of all specifically religious activities in the history of man. The sociological implication and import of this activity are accordingly very far-reaching.

A healthy, or at times even unhealthy, competition is noted in certain religious traditions among these role types. This may occur between two persons belonging to different role types, for instance, the priest and the prophet, or it may even be within one person, challenged with a role-set or multiple roles. In Buddhism tension has existed between holy men (monks), given to cultivation of wisdom, mental concentration and ethical virtue, and priestly ritual specialists. The Sanskrit and Pall terms, Bhiksu and Bhikku, meaning beggar or mendicant, do not connote a priestly role as such. Weber speaks of a similar problem between monasticism and hierocratic charisma in Christianity." The inherent tensions emerge; the more genuine monasticism is independent of institutional charisma because its own charisma is immediate to God." The combination of three role types - the priest, the king and the prophet - in the role type of the Christian priest today seems to leave room for a similar conflict.

- The Evolution of Priesthood

Priesthood, the office of a priest, a ritual expert learned in a special knowledge of the technique of worship and accepted as a religious and spiritual leader. Throughout the long and varied history of religion, the priesthood has been the official institution that has mediated and maintained a state of equilibrium between the sacred and the profane aspects of human society and that has exercised a stabilizing influence on social structures and on cultic organizations. The term priest is derived etymologically from the Greek word presbyteros ("elder"), of which it is a contraction, and it is equated with the Latin word sacerdos (the Roman officiant at the sacrifices and sacred rites).

NATURE AND SIGNIFICANCE

The primary role of the priest is that of the ritual expert, the one who has a special and sometimes secret knowledge of the techniques of worship, including incantations, prayers, sacrificial acts, songs, and other acts that are believed to bridge the separation between the divine or sacred and the profane realms. The priest gains such knowledge through the institution known as the priesthood, which may be composed of various groups or guilds devoted to all or only a few aspects of the priestly craft. Because the priest gains his special knowledge from a school for priests, he is differentiated from other religious and cultic leaders, such as the magician, shaman (healer and visionary), diviner, or prophet, who obtain their positions by means of individual efforts (e.g., learning from a master magician or diviner; individual ecstatic experiences that are publicly recognized). As a member of the institution that regulates the relationship between the divine or sacred and the profane realms through the various rituals of a particular religion, the priest is the accepted religious and spiritual leader in his society.

At various times in the history of a culture or society the priestly institution may be attacked by other institutions or groups that vie for the religious leadership (and thus sometimes the social, political, and economic leadership) of a people. Such anticlericalism is a phenomenon not only of modern society (as noted in the Russian Revolution of 1917, the Mexican Civil War that began in 1857, and other less dramatic movements) but also in the ancient world, such as in Egypt in the 14th century bce, when the priesthood of the god Amon and the priesthood of the god Aton changed positions. Anticlericalism may be fostered by battles for religious leadership between two or more opposing priestly groups, or by prophets and others who are concerned with religious experiences in their personal rather than in their institutional forms. Among Protestants the doctrine of the priesthood of all believers (i.e., all believers have direct access to God) militates generally against strong anticlerical tendencies within their own ranks. In Islam there is, technically, no priesthood, though there are local spiritual and community leaders, such as the imam, the mullah, the mufti, the qadi, and others.

THE PRIEST AND HIS OFFICE

The function of the priest as the mediator and maintainer of the equilibrium between the sacred and the profane in human society, and as the stabilizer of the social structures and the cultic organizations, determines the various criteria for holding the priestly office. In preliterate society the functions are accomplished by ritual experts who are trained in the special knowledge and techniques of magico-religious disciplines in which sacred power is believed to be inherent. They also are trained in disciplines that enable them to gain a supernormal psychic knowledge and in the techniques of mystical experience. As agents of the sacred power, they are believed to have the ability to control and manipulate through ritual natural processes and events and to engage in a sacramental relationship between humanity and the sacred order on which the community and its members depend for their sustenance, survival, and well-being.

Because religious institutions and beliefs are intimately connected with other social institutions, those who are set apart to establish efficacious relations with the transcendental powers that are believed to control the universe, as well as human affairs and destinies, occupy a key position at the dynamic centre in the social structure. Thus, in certain types of societies the office and functions of the priest may be limited to those having a particular ancestry, those belonging to certain tribes (such as the Levites in Judaism), families (such as the Eumolpids of the Eleusinian mystery religion of Greece), or castes (such as the Brahmins in Hinduism), and those initiated into certain professional orders (such as the cure doctors among the Maya).

Besides such sociocultural criteria, there are also certain personal requirements in various cultures for those who would become members of a priesthood. Celibacy (as in Roman Catholicism and the Archakas of the Digambara sect in Jainism), asceticism (as in various Buddhist groups), and religious experiences (as among some Holiness Protestant sects) are among the personal requirements for those who aspire to or are chosen to assume the priestly office.

PRIESTHOOD IN THE RELIGIONS OF THE WORLD

• Nonliterate cultures

The office of priesthood in nonliterate society ranges from the medicine man, who magically manipulates the sacred power as a quasi-impersonal force, to the shaman, who, as an agent of divine or spiritual beings, may be at once a medicine man, a visionary, an occult diviner, and a genuine sacerdotal cult leader. Not infrequently, chiefs or headmen of a clan or village may become sacred men or ritual experts displaying supernatural insight and knowledge as the agents of spiritual beings. As such, they may eventually become prophets or sacral kings occupying a unique status in the community. This status may be acquired by accepted claims of descent from a mythical divine ancestor or God on whom the fertility of the crops and the welfare of the community in general are thought to depend. Occult power and insight may be derived from spirits with which the prophet or diviner is related in a trance or ecstasy, or else in dreams, visions, or auguries and oracles that make known the divine will. To occupy such a position, a strenuous course of training is frequently required, involving some knowledge of therapeutics (healing), leechcraft (use of leeches in healing), trephining (operating on the skull), herbs, poisons, and perhaps sleight of hand and similar techniques, together with the development of psychical and occult qualities. While charlatanry (pretensions to medical knowledge) is often practiced, the office also demands an understanding of the technical equipment calculated to bring about the results that are sought, and the proper type of temperament, conditions of mind, and state of emotion.

Unlike the shaman and the medicine man, both of whom exercise their respective functions while relying largely on their own initiative and psychic and occult powers of divination, healing, and direct access to the spirit world at their command, the priest supplicates and conciliates supernatural forces superior to himself, guards the sacred tradition in his care, and acts as the master of sacrifice. The shaman or magician officiates in his own name and by his own methods and techniques; the priest serves the altar, in the temple or shrine, as the representative of the community in his relations with the gods and the sacred order by virtue of the status and its functions that have been conferred upon him at his ordination, bestowing its sacredness and attendant taboos.

- The ancient Middle East

In the Nile valley the occupant of the throne (the pharaoh) was regarded as a god incarnate, the sacred king. Because he was believed to be the epitome of all that was divine, he alone was the intermediary between humankind and the gods whom he summed up in his complex personality. Before Menes, founder of the 1st dynasty (c. 3100–2890 bce), centralized the rule of Upper and Lower Egypt, the high priest and king “Scorpion” was traditionally considered to be the incarnation of Horus (the sky god). Under the powerful influence of the priesthood of Heliopolis, the sacred kingship was given a solar significance; the pharaohs were represented as the sons of the sun god Re, who was identified with the god Atum. When Memphis became the imperial city, Re-Atum was brought into relation with its god, Ptah (the creator), and subsequently with Osiris, a fertility god who also was regarded as a god of the dead. Osiris was equated with the life-giving waters of the Nile and believed to be the first civilizing king, reigning in the person of the pharaoh as his posthumous son Horus. Therefore, in Egypt the divine origin and status of the monarchy was so firmly established that it became the stabilizing force of the civilization in the Nile valley.

In theory, the king of Egypt was the high priest of every god, and in all important ceremonies he alone was depicted in the temple scenes as the officiant. For practical purposes, however, he delegated his functions to the particular professional local priesthoods. In due course the priests, courtiers, and officials shared in his divine powers and privileges. Even though they only acted on behalf of the divine ruler, his representatives shared in some measure his personality and potency. As the priest par excellence, the pharaoh remained unique, and it was from him that the priesthood and nobility exercised their sacerdotal functions when the solar theology of Heliopolis was established in the 5th dynasty (c. 2494–c. 2345 bce). After the 5th dynasty the pharaoh was accredited exclusively with having built all the temples, and on their walls, he was portrayed officiating as the mediator between humanity and the gods in all important rites. In fact, nevertheless, his place was taken by one of the retinue of priests attached to the royal household or to the local temples. Only very occasionally did he perform his sacerdotal duties in person. Every temple had its high priest who, in addition to his sacred offices, might also be a high judicial official, thereby combining sacred and profane roles, varying with the actions performed.

From the number of titles assigned to priestly officials in the Old Kingdom (c. 2686–c. 2160 bce), it appears that one priest must have served simultaneously a multiplicity of cults in the shrine to which he was attached and received a share of the offerings and emoluments. In wealthy great temples in the New Kingdom (c. 1567–c. 1085 bce) there was an elaborate organization, and a large staff engaged in administrative, civil, and educational duties, as well as in their sacerdotal and mortuary functions. There were also a number of priestesses associated with the mother-goddess Hathor (wife of the sun god Re), who were mainly concerned with playing the sacred sistra and other musical instruments. From the 18th to the 21st dynasties (1567–1085 bce), however, under the Theban priesthood of Amon-Re, the priestly hierarchy was able to create an absolute “state within a state.”

In Mesopotamia, where kingship occupied a less prominent position than it did in the Nile valley, powerful priesthoods and highly organized temples were firmly established in and after the 4th millennium bce. The temples were centres of sacred learning of the content and methods of incantation, prognostication, exorcism, and political and economic administration, and their attendant priests were divided into classes with special sacerdotal and secular functions. The valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers contained a series of city-states loosely bound together under the rule of a governor (patesi or ensi) and of a high priest (sangu mah). Their main functions were to integrate the temple communities of the city, their revenues and boundaries; and the unigallu, or head of the priesthood, was responsible for the performance of the seasonal rites, with the assistance of those who sang the liturgies and directed the temple music and those who uttered the lamentations, invoked the oracles, and interpreted the astrological signs and omens. The duties of other members of the priesthood included making incantations and pronouncing spells and exorcisms. The seers, or baru, foretold the future by means of soothsaying, interpreting dreams and visions, and communicating revelations.

An important function of the priesthood in the ancient Middle East was that of exorcism. All down the ages good and evil have been viewed as two contending forces in perpetual conflict, and in the dual task of the riddance of evil and the induction of good the exorcist, the shaman, and the seer have exercised complementary functions hardly distinguishable in the higher cultural levels in Babylonia and Assyria. When the function of the driving out of demons from human beings and buildings by incantations and ritual expulsions was separated from the interpretation of omens and astrological portents, the office of the exorcists was in ever increasing demand. According to cuneiform texts from about the 3rd millennium bce, exorcists held a position of supreme importance, assisting at the consecration of temples, at funerals, and at seasonal ceremonies. In the temple schools, exorcists, diviners, and astrologers, together with physicians, scribes, and judges, fostered the study of astronomy, medicine, and jurisprudence. In their sacerdotal functions and capacities, they were regarded as the agents and exponents of the gods, having a monopoly on sacred knowledge, controlling for good or evil the destinies of the community and its members. Therefore, their power was enormous, and they maintained the relation between religion and culture by their all-embracing hierarchy that determined the present welfare and future destinies of both human beings and the social order.

Similar beliefs and practices occurred in northern Syria in the middle of the 2nd millennium bce, before the Israelite settlement in Canaan. Here, again, the priesthood was responsible for the dramatic rituals on which the social structure and the well-being of humans were believed to depend, especially in the climax of the autumnal festival that culminated in the enthronement of the year god. The priestly movement was centred in the temple of Ugarit, and the religious texts discovered there (Ras Shamra) were essentially liturgical documents devised to make the sacred drama enacted there efficacious. Baal, the weather god, was regarded as “the lord of the furrows of the field,” responsible for the rain and the production of the fruits of the earth. A series of temples was erected in his honour in Syria and Palestine. The temple at Ras Shamra was a considerable structure with a lattice, the opening of which was supposed to produce the autumnal rains, and its liturgical ritual was celebrated by the priests and priestesses in their official capacities as those who personified the gods and goddesses responsible for providential bounty and beneficence.

- The Journey from the Natural Priesthood to the Professional Priesthood in Religions

Priesthood is said to owe its origin to the universal need of mediation of superhuman assistance, felt by humankind in the struggle of life. In its evolution we note two phases, namely the phase of the natural priesthood and the phase of the professional or regular priesthood. There are indications to affirm that originally everyone invoked the gods each for oneself. In the early times, worship was confined to the deified members of the kindred, and later to those of tribes. Then the heads of families or tribes most spontaneously performed the worship was confined to the deified members of the kindred, and later to those of tribes. Then the heads of families or tribes most spontaneously performed the priestly role because they as the oldest and most experienced members of the family stood closest to the ancestors. When powers of nature also began to be worshipped and the group of worshippers extended beyond a family; the regular priesthood was initiated. As everyone is not equally proficient in mediation, the expertise of professionals, supposed to possess greater knowledge and power is sought to secure better results. But to a very great extent both the forms stayed intermingled. Gradually those proficient in interpreting the wishes of gods and practising magical arts won the confidence of people and attained a certain pre-eminence, and formed a special class. Among some people's certain classes who had unmistakable priestly affinities - those who, when in a state of ecstasy, are believed to be inspired by the gods, those ministering in famous shrines or sanctuaries, those who work miracles - were the forerunners of a regular priesthood. When rituals lost their simplicity, professional priesthood became even more necessary.

Priestly functions are exercised among identical groups by their heads or leaders; such as the father in the family, the chieftain in the clan or tribe, the king in the nation or people. With the growing development and differentiation of social organizations and stratification, certain cultic functions of the leader are associated with special individuals or professional groups, and as a result, professional magicians, diviners, and even prophets emerge in the more highly differentiated "primitive" societies.

[These functions are referred to as semi-priestly.] With the increasing complexity of cultural and sociological conditions, professional differentiation takes place, and a professional priesthood appears.

The history of several religions testifies to an evolution of priesthood from the natural to the regular or professional. In the case of Hinduism, for example, Dr. Radhakrishnan maintains that,

The original Aryans all belonged to one class, every one being priest and soldier, trader and tiller of the soil. There was no privileged order of priests. The complexity of life led to a division of classes among the Aryans. Though to start with each man could offer sacrifices to gods without anybody's mediation, priesthood and

, aristocracy separated themselves from the proletariat... When sacrifices assume an important role, when the increasing complexity of life rendered necessary division of life, certain families, distinguished for learning wisdom, poetic and speculative gifts, became representatives in worship under the title of Purohita, or one set in front. In view of their great function of conserving the tradition of the Aryans, this class was freed from the necessity of the struggle for existence... The Brahmins are not priesthood pledged to support fixed doctrines, but an intellectual aristocracy charged with the moulding of the higher life of the people.

It is pertinent to remark here that priests and cults had not been a sine qua non in all religions at all times. In the case of early Buddhism, for instance, the possibility of cultic priesthood was very remote. "Buddhism had no order or ritual of sacrifice to require the services of an officiating priest, with expert knowledge of the modes and significance of the rites. In fact, Buddhist scriptures do mention instances wherein the Buddha himself ridiculed ritualistic practices of Brahmin priests. But already during its early history in China, when confronted by the strong cultic traits of Confucianism, Buddhism adopted cultic practices. Hinduism speaks of the Teacher - Brahmin, the Priest-Brahmin, and the Superman-Brahman.

Professional priesthood exists in two forms, namely the hereditary and the vocational. According to the former, priesthood is the privilege of a particular family or tribal lineage. The Jewish Levitical priesthood, the Hindu Brahmanical priesthood and Zoroastrian priesthood are a few examples. Vocational priesthood recruits candidates from the pool of its promising young members, on the basis of devotional, intellectual and moral qualities. Professional priests distinguish themselves by special costumes, long hair, separate language and some ascetic regulations such as sexual control and fasting. Along with institutionalization, elements such as initiation rites and training assumed importance. While in the past most religions - Hinduism, Buddhism, Taoism, Zoroastrianism, Christianity have reserved priesthood to male members, recent trends in certain sections of religious membership such as the Anglican Church have been found to advocate women priesthood. While many religions in their history have been found to move to and from priestly celibacy for various reasons, the Latin Rite of Roman Catholicism is one of the strongest in its favour in contemporary times.

As history evolves, in the great world religions, the representatives of the priesthood are organized into a highly complex structure in which a more or less differentiated order of groups corresponds to the priestly hierarchy with its various activities. At the start the divisions were on simpler grounds such as the natural group (clan, tribe, people), the local group (village, town, district), and the political group (nation). Later, priests are connected with the formation of specifically religious organizations, temporally integrated by the personal charisma of the priestly leader alone, or organized as institutional units like the parish.

- The Sacred Versus the Secular Powers

According to the nature of the governance of a country, Weber identifies three types of relation between the secular and the sacred powers in the history of the world. While in the first type, a ruler is legitimated by the priests, in the second the high priest is also the king, and in the third, the secular ruler exercises supreme authority in sacred matters too. Thus, while some countries had kings who were also priests, some others had priests who were also kings. Even in Islam that, unlike most other religions, does not have a class of priests or clergy, In the strict sense of the term, we find that there was a time when the roles of Imam (the leader of the prayers in the worship rites In mosques) and ruler of the place were assigned to the same individual.

When a governor was appointed to a province, he was also appointed as Imam to lead the prayers, and this practice continued for a long time. In fact, the honour of leading the prayers (imamat) in Islam was great as the honour of kingship, and the two offices, the office of the spiritual leader and that of the temporal leader were combined in one person for a long time. As the ruler himself was the Imam at the centre, so were his governors the imams in the different provincial headquarters. The priest and the presentday mullah had no place in early Islam.

According to Weber, in hierocratic domination, priestly power seeks ascendancy at the cost of the political power. Often the latter is presented as an inevitable evil, permitted by God due to the sinfulness of the world, and which believers should resign to but refrain from. At times it is projected even as a God-given tool for the subjection of anti-ecclesiastic forces. "In practice, therefore, hierocracy seeks to turn the political ruler into a vassal and to deprive her/him of independent means of power ..." Meanwhile, hierocracy makes every attempt to protect itself: an autonomous administrative apparatus, a tax system (tithes), legal forms (endowments) for the protection of ecclesiastic landholdings, bureaucratization of administration, and development of office charisma at the cost of personal charisma.

In Weber's mind, the extreme opposite of any kind of hierocracy is Caesaro-papism - the complete subordination of the priestly to the secular powers. Herein religious affairs are but a branch of political administration. The political rulers fulfill these obligations either directly or with the assistance of the state-maintained priestly professionals. Caesaro-papism is nowhere found in its purest form. As a rule, priestly charisma compromises with the secular power either tacitly or even through a concordat. On the whole, the general picture of the relationship between the two, as portrayed by Weber is one of a cold war.

"Everywhere state and society have been greatly influenced by the struggle between military and temple nobility, between royal and priestly following. This struggle did not always lead to an open conflict, but it produced distinctive features and differences..."

According to Aberbach, even though there are important differences between the sacred and the secular, history of religion testifies to a close parallel between the two: while even in its secular forms, charisma has a religious dimension; traditional religious charisma is rarely devoid of political and other significance. "Political charisma draws on the language, the spirit and even the ideological conviction of religion. Charismatic religious leadership is no less infused with politics. The devotees of religious charismatics are inspired not only by their message but also by their political skill and military success." The major religions of the ancient world were all official State religions. Many of the great political charismatics were born into families at least nominally religious, were educated in religious schools, and had their outstanding qualities associated with religious leadership: Washington's personal humility, Garibaldi's asceticism, Robespierre's propensity for solitude and meditation. He concludes that, "the many parallels between religious and political charisma mean that in practice the two are often indistinguishable." The linkage between charismatic political leaders and figures of religious authority - priest and prophet, saviour and messiah - though varying in intensity, is little surprising. R Robertson notes the two simultaneous processes of quite drastic politicization of religion during the past fifteen years, and the 'religionization' of government which denotes the involvement of the modern state in 'deep' issues of human life, and the ways in which the state-organized society has become, in varying degrees, an object of veneration and 'deep' identification.

It is challenging to note here that in the evolution of most, if not all, religions, priesthood was always confined to cultic activities. Priests perform many other functions: directly or indirectly related to cultic functions. He is the guardian of traditions and the keeper of the sacred knowledge and of the technique of meditation and prayer. He is the custodian of the holy law, corresponding to the cosmic moral and ritual order. As an interpreter of this law, the priest may function as judge, administrator, teacher, and scholar, and formulate standards and rules of conduct. Since he performs the sacred rites, he contributes towards the development of sacred song, writing, literature, music, dance, sacred painting, sculpture and architecture. As the guardian of tradition, the priest is also the wise man, the adviser, educator, and philosopher. In the extent of the performance of these multifarious functions, there exists difference among religions according to their stage of evolution from primitive civilizations to the highly developed ritualistic religions.

The Babylonian priests had much to do with the interpretation not only of moral and religious law, but also with many of the civil enactments. It was the duty of some of them to receive the tithes, and to certify that they had been paid. It is said of the Shinto priests that they "not only serve in the performance of formal shrine rituals but also bear responsibility for such administrative tasks as the upkeep and management of shrine facilities and finances... (After the Second World War), great expectations are placed on them as well for activities in the areas of social welfare and education" among the Indo-Aryan speaking invaders of Northwestern India in the middle and late second millennium BCE. the priestly social class was "responsible not only for a wide range of cultic functions but also for the composition and preservation of the sacred traditions of oral poetry." The Rigveda mentions the purohita (the domestic priest of the king or of some wealthy noble) who was not only in the constant and intimate service of the king, but was closely concerned with the king in his more worldly functions. The ethic of compassion (karuna) was the fundamental motivating force of Buddhism. So, the Buddhist monks have traditionally filled the role of spiritual advisers and teachers of the laity. Now it is not uncommon to find sangha social services in Theravada countries like Thailand and Sri Lanka.

In Judaism, besides cultic functions, priests had oracular functions, therapeutic functions, instructional and juridical functions, and administrative and political functions in fact, history testifies that during the period of the Second Temple, when Judaea and Jerusalem were under the domination of foreign empires, the priesthood of Jerusalem played an important political role, the priests serving also as leaders of Jewish communities. In Islam there is properly no caste, class, or profession which monopolizes the performance of religious rites when these were at first performed in public, the leader was properly the chief of the community, and name imam" 'leader in prayer' is therefore used for 'sovereign,' 'chief authority,' and the like. The sovereign of the capital took the lead in prayer.

On account of the direct and immediate contact that priests have with those who depend on him for mediation of the divine, priests come to exert tremendous influence on them. Not only in hierarchically graded ecclesiastical bodies but also in religious groups of more or less egalitarian bodies, the religious leader may become implicitly trusted, rightly revered, and indispensable guides of their followers. From originally a primarily religious influence, the influence extends to moral, social, cultural; and political spheres.

The history of religions has sufficient evidence to show that a degeneration of priests and priesthood has been part and parcel of almost all religious traditions at one time or other. Scholars of Indian thought have observed the shift from the simple offerings of the early Vedic times to the complicated and ritual-ridden sacrifices of the Brahmana period. Persuasion of gods gives way to compelling of gods while the sacrifice was exalted even above the gods. Introducing a distinctly magical element into the rituals, "priest and prayer henceforward become transformed into magician and spell." Speaking of Nambutiris who were the temple priests in Kerala, Thulaseedharan says that it was remunerative services that attracted them. They lived in exuberant comfort and luxury. Though they were to be guardians of the ethics of society, they did nothing of that sort. "On the contrary, they were eager only to drink life's sweet honey to the lees, not leaving even a drop to the lower castes." Some historians detect a similar state of affairs among Christian priests during the time preceding the Protestant Reformation. The practice of simony, corruption, sale of indulgences and craving for money were marks of the age.

Nevertheless, priests have often been throughout history regarded as the official go between the sacred and the profane. "Throughout the long and varied history of religion, the priesthood has been the official institution that has mediated and maintained a state of equilibrium between the sacred and the profane aspects of human society and that has exercised a stabilising influence on social structure and on cultic organization." But the various administrative duties derived from the cultic activities of priests. Therefore, the less the communion with the numen expressed in formalized cult, the closer he is to a magician. "As long as the mediation of the priest is desired to secure material or ideal advantages (do ut des), religion is still close to magic, but a higher stage is reached where it becomes the function of the priest to thank and to adore in his own and other's name."

3.10 Shamans

In sociology, a shaman is a part-time religious specialist who enters an ecstatic state to communicate with the supernatural world, serving as a healer, diviner, and intermediary for their community. Derived from Siberian practices, the term has become a catch-all but is also criticized for being culturally biased and oversimplified. Shamans operate outside formal religious hierarchies, using their unique trance abilities and spiritual partnerships to address community needs, from finding game to placating spirits and influencing agriculture.

KEY CHARACTERISTICS IN A SOCIOLOGICAL CONTEXT

- Part-time Practitioner: Unlike full-time priests, shamans perform their spiritual duties alongside other means of earning a living.
- Ecstatic Trance: A core aspect is the ability to enter a trance to perform spiritual journeys, often involving out-of-body experiences.

- Direct Spirit Contact: Shamans are believed to communicate directly with spirits, who may grant power or provide aid.
- Community Service: They act on behalf of individuals or the community, performing tasks such as healing, divination, and influencing subsistence activities.
- Social Role: They are seen as valuable specialists who bridge the human and spiritual worlds.

ORIGIN AND USAGE OF THE TERM

- Siberian Roots: The word "shaman" comes from the Siberian Tungus-speaking peoples.
- 19th Century Adoption: Western social scientists adopted the term in the 19th century, sometimes placing it at the beginning of a supposed "unilineal evolution" of religion.
- Critiques: The term is often criticized for its broad application, which can mask cultural diversity and perpetuate stereotypes about non-Western societies, leading to a lack of analytical utility.

CULTURAL CONTEXT AND FUNCTION

- Diverse Practices: Shamanic practices vary significantly across cultures but share the common element of using spiritual trance to interact with a non-ordinary reality.
- Examples: Shamans are found in various cultures, including those in Siberia, Sub-Saharan Africa, East Asia, North and South America.
- Specific Roles: In their communities, shamans might perform agricultural rituals, guide souls to the afterlife, or provide healing and spiritual guidance.

There is currently unprecedeted interest, excitement and confusion about shamanism. Shamanic literature, rituals and workshops are proliferating and have spawned a veritable cottage industry. Genuinely shamanically trained anthropologists such as Michael Harner and highly controversial figures such as Lynn Andrews, "the shaman of Beverly Hills" (Clifton, 1989), are offering shamanism workshops. Given that only a few years ago there was concern that shamanism would soon be extinct, it is clear that the tradition, or at least its contemporary Western version is doing rather well.

What is not so clear is what exactly a shaman is. In fact, on this controversial - point there is remarkable controversy. On the one hand the views shaman has been called "mentally deranged" and "an outright of psychotic" (Devereaux, 1961) "veritable idio (Wissler, 1931), a charlatan, epileptic and, perhaps most often (Kakar, 1982; shaman Noli, 1983) a hysterical or schizophrenic.

On the other hand, an opposite but equally extreme view seems to be emerging in the popular literature. Here shamanic states are being identified with those of Buddhism, Yoga or Christian mysticism. Thus, for example, Holger Kalweit (1988, p. 236)

Unfortunately, there seem to be serious deficiencies with these comparisons which appear to be based on gross similarities rather than careful phenomenological comparisons (Walsh, 1990). Space does not allow presenting such analyses here. Suffice it to say when careful phenomenological comparisons are made, then it becomes apparent that shamanic experiences differ significantly from those of traditional categories of mental illness or those of mystics from other traditions (Noli, 1983; Walsh 1990).

So, contrary to much popular and professional thinking we cannot simply define (or productively discuss) shamans and shamanism in terms of either diagnostic categories or other mystical traditions. Rather we need to consider and define them as unique phenomena. Clearly an adequate definition might do much to help reduce the enormous confusion concerning the nature of shamanism.

• DEFINITION

The term Shaman itself comes from the work man of the Tungus people of Siberia, meaning "one who is excited, moved, raised." It may be derived from an ancient Indian word meaning "to heat oneself or practice austerities" (Slacker, 1986) or from a Tungus verb meaning know" (Hultkrantz, 1973). But whatever its derivation the term shaman has been widely adopted by anthropologists to refer to specific groups of religious healers in diverse cultures who have sometimes been called medicine men, witch doctors, sorcerers, wizards, magicians or seers. However, these terms do not adequately define the specific subgroup of healers who fit more stringent definitions of shaman such as the one to be used here. The meaning and significance of this definition, and of shamanism itself, will become clearer if we examine the way in which our definitions and understanding of shamanism have evolved over time.

Early anthropologists were particularly struck by the shamans' unique interactions with "spirits." Many in the tribe might claim to revere, see, or even be possessed by spirits. However, only the shamans claimed to have some degree of control over them and to be able to command, commune and intercede with them for the benefit of the tribe. Thus Shirokogoroff (1935, p. 269),<sup>1</sup> one of the earliest explorers of the Siberian Tungus people, stated that:

In all Tungus languages this term (saman) refers to persons of both sexes who have mastered spirits, who at their will call introduce these spirits into themselves and use their power over the spirits in their own interests, particularly helping other people, who suffer from the spirits; in such a capacity they may possess a complex of special methods for dealing with the spirits.

But whereas early explorers were most impressed by the shamans' interactions with spirits, later researchers have been impressed by the shamans' control of their own states of consciousness in which these interactions occur (Dobkin, de Rios & Winkleman, 1989; Noli, 1983; Peters, 1981 ; Peters & shamanism Price-Williams, 1980, 1983) As Western culture has become as more interested in altered states of consciousness (ASC), so to first researchers have become interested in the use of altered states in religious practices (Tart, 1983a, b), and it appears that the to use first tradition to use such states was shamanism. Contemporary altered definitions of shamanism have therefore focused on the use of states such states (Harner, 1982; Noli, 1983; Price & Price-Williams, 1980).

- The origin of Shamas

However, there are many, many possible states of consciousness (Shapiro & Walsh, 1984; Walsh & Vaughan, 1980; Wilber, 1977, 1980), and the question therefore naturally arises as to which ones are peculiar to, and defining of, shamanism. There are broad and narrow definitions in the broad definition the "only defining attribute is that the specialist enter into a controlled ASC on behalf of his community" (Price Williams, 1980, p. 408). Such specialists would include, for example, mediums who enter a trance and then claim to speak for spirits should be noted at this point that the use of the term "spirits" here is not meant to necessarily imply that there exist separate entities that control or communicate with people. Rather the term is simply being used to describe the way in which shamans and mediums interpret their experience.

So, a broad definition of shamanism would include any practitioners who enter controlled altered states of consciousness no matter which particular states these may be. Narrow definitions on the other hand specify the altered states) Quite precisely as ecstatic states. Indeed, for Mircea Eliade (1964 one of the greatest religious scholars of the 20th century, "A first definition of this complex phenomenon, and perhaps the least hazardous, will be: shamanism technique of ecstasy." Here ecstasy infers not much bliss but more sense, as the Random House dictionary defines it of being taken or moved out of one's self or one's normal state and entering a state of intensified or heightened feeling." This definition of ecstasy as "being taken out of one's self or one's normal state" is, as we will see, particularly appropriate for shamanism.

The distinctive feature of the shamanic ecstasy is the experience of "soul flight" or "journeying" or "out-of-body experience" (Eliade, 1964; Harner, 1982). That is, in the ecstatic state shamans experience themselves, or their soul/spirit, flying through space and traveling to either other worlds or distant parts of this world. In other words, "the shaman specializes in a trance during which his soul is believed to leave his body and ascend to the sky or descend to the underworld" (Eliade, 1964, p. 5). These flights reflect the shamanic cosmology which comprises a three-tiered universe of upper, middle, and lower worlds, the middle one corresponding to our earth. The shaman ranges throughout this threefold world system to learn, obtain power, or to diagnose and treat those who come for help and healing. During these journeys shamans may experience themselves exploring other worlds, meeting other worldly people, animals or spirits, seeing the cause and cure of a patient's illness, or interceding with friendly or demonic forces.

So far, then, we have three key features of shamanism to include in any definition. The first is that shamans can voluntarily enter altered states of consciousness. The second is that in these states they experience themselves leaving their bodies and journeying to other realms in a manner analogous to contemporary reports of some out-of-body experiences (Monroe, 1971; Irwin, 1985) or lucid dreams (LaBerge, 1985). Third, they use these journeys as a means for acquiring knowledge or power and helping people in their community.

Interaction with spirits is also frequently mentioned in definitions of shamanism. In addition, Michael Harner, an anthropologist who may have more personal experience of shamanic practices than any other Westerner, suggests that a key element of shamanic practices may be "contact with an ordinarily hidden reality" (Harner, 1982, p. 25). Thus, he defines a shaman as "a man or woman who enters an altered state of consciousness at will to contact and utilize an ordinarily hidden reality in order to acquire knowledge, power, and to help other persons" (Harner, 1982, p. 25).

Should these two additional elements, "contacting a hidden reality," and "communication with spirits," be included as essential elements of a definition of shamanism? Here we are on tricky philosophical ground. Certainly, this is what shamans experience and believe they are doing. However, it is an enormous philosophical leap to assume that this is what they are actually doing. The precise nature (or in philosophical terms the ontological status) of both the realms which shamans experience themselves traversing and the entities they meet is an open question. To the shaman they are interpreted as independently and fully "real"; to a Westerner with no belief in other realms or entities they would likely be interpreted as subjective mind creations.

It may, in fact even be impossible to decide this question. Technically speaking we may have here an example of ontological indeterminacy due to the under-determination of theory by observation. Speaking more simply, this is the inability to determine a phenomenon's ontological status because the observations allow multiple theoretical interpretations. The result is that one's interpretation of such indeterminate phenomena (in this case of the nature of "hidden reality" and "spirits") depends largely on one's own philosophical leanings or worldview. We are therefore on safer grounds defining shamanism if we skirt these questions of philosophical interpretation as much as possible.

In summary, shamanism might be defined as a family of traditions whose practitioners focus on voluntarily entering altered states of consciousness in which they experience definition themselves, or their spirit(s), traveling to other realms at will and interacting with other entities in order to serve their shamanism community.

- ORIGIN

Whatever its origin, shamanism has been widely distributed throughout the world. It is found today in areas as widespread as Siberia, North and South America, and Australia and it is believed to have existed in most parts of the world at one time or other. The remarkable similarities among shamans from widely dispersed areas of the world raise the question of how these similarities developed. One possibility is that they emerged spontaneously in different locations perhaps because of a common innate human tendency or recurrent social need. The other is that they resulted from migration and diffusion from common ancestors.

If migration is the answer, then that migration must have begun long ago. Shamanism occurs among tribes with so many different languages that diffusion from a common ancestor must have begun at least 20,000 years ago (Winkelman, 1984).

This long time period makes it difficult to explain why shamanic practices would remain so stable for so long in so many cultures while language and social practices changed so drastically. These difficulties make it seem unlikely that migration alone can account for the long history and far-flung distribution of shamanism.

It follows that if the worldwide, history-long distribution of shamanism cannot be attributed to diffusion from a single invention in prehistoric times, then it must have been rediscovered discovered and rediscovered in diverse times and cultures. This suggests that some recurring combination of social forces and innate abilities must have repeatedly elicited and maintained shamanic roles, rituals and states of consciousness.

- Shamanism rediscovered diverse times and cultures

Certainly, there seems to be evidence of some innate human tendency to enter specific altered states. Studies of different meditative traditions suggest that an innate tendency to access altered states can be very precise. For example, for two and a half thousand years Buddhists have described accessing precisely eight highly specific and distinct states of extreme concentration. These concentrated states that jhanas, are extremely subtle, stable, and blissful and have been very precisely described for millennia. Today a few Western meditators are beginning to access them and have been fortunate to interview three of these people. In each case their experiences tallied remarkably well with ancient accounts. Clearly then there seems to be some innate tendency in the human mind to settle into certain specific states if it is given the right conditions or practices.

The same principle may hold for shamanic states. Observations of Westerners in shamanic workshops suggest that most people are readily able to enter shamanic states to some degree. These states can also be induced by a wide variety of conditions which suggest that there may be some inherent tendency for the mind to adopt them. The conditions which induce them can include such natural occurrences as isolation, fatigue, mic sound, or ingestion of hallucinogens (Winkelman, 1984; Walsh, 1989, 1990). Thus, they would likely be rediscovered by different generations and cultures. Since the states may be pleasurable, meaningful and healing they would likely then be actively sought after and the methods for inducing them remembered and transmitted across generations.

- Distribution due to innate tendency and diffusion

Thus, shamanism and its widespread distribution may reflect an innate human tendency to enter certain pleasurable and valuable states of consciousness. Once discovered, then rituals and beliefs which support the induction and expression of the states would likely also arise and shamanism would emerge once again. This natural tendency might be supported and amplified by communication between cultures. For example, shamanism in Northern Asia appears to have been modified by the importation of yogic practices from India (Eliade, 1964). Thus, the global distribution of shamanism may be due to both innate tendency and diffusion of information. The end result is that this ancient tradition has spread across the earth and has survived for perhaps tens of thousands of years, a period which represents a significant proportion of this time that fully developed human beings (modern Homo sapiens) have been on the planet.

Given that shamanism has endured so long and spread so widely the question naturally arises as to why it occurs in some cultures and not in others. Answers are beginning to emerge from cross-cultural research. One notable study examined 47 societies spanning almost 4000 years from 1750 i.e., the Babylonians, to the present century (Winkelman, 1984, 1989) is interesting to note that, prior to Western influence, all of these 47 cultures used altered states of consciousness as a basis for religious and healing practices. However, although shamanic practices were found in most regions of the world they occurred only in particular types of societies. These were primarily simple nomadic hunting and gathering societies. These peoples relied very little on agriculture and had almost no social classes or political organization. Within these tribes the shaman played many roles, both sacred and mundane: medicine man, healer, ritualist, keeper of the cultural myths, medium, and master of spirits. With their many roles and the power vacuum offered by a classless society shamans exerted a major influence on their tribe and people.

However, as societies evolve and become more complex, it appears that this situation changes dramatically. In fact, as societies become sedentary rather than nomadic, agricultural rather than foraging, and socially and politically stratified rather than classless, then shamanism as such seems to disappear (Winkelman, 1984, 1989). In its place appear a variety of specialists who focus on one of the shaman's many roles. Thus, instead of shamans we find healers, priests, mediums and sorcerers/witches. These specialize respectively in medical, ritual, spirit possession, and malevolent magic practices. An obvious contemporary Western parallel is the disappearance of the old medical general practitioner or G.P. and the appearance of diverse specialists.

It is interesting to compare some of these ancient specialists with the shaman G.P., who preceded them. Priests emerge as representatives of organized religion and are often religious, moral, and even political leaders. They are the leaders of social rites and rituals and on behalf of their society they pray to and propitiate the spiritual forces. However, unlike their shamanic ancestors they usually have little training or experience in altered states. (Hoppal, 1984).

Whereas the priests inherit the socially beneficial religious and magical roles of the shaman, the sorcerers withdraw and inherit the malevolent ones. Shamans were often ambivalent figures for their people, revered for their healing and helping powers, feared for their malevolent magic (Rogers, 1982). Sorcerers and witches, at least as they are defined in Winkelman's (1984) and other anthropological studies, are the specialists in malevolent magic and as such they tend to be feared, hated, and persecuted.

3.11 PROPHETS

In sociology, "prophet" has a religious meaning referring to individuals who channel divine messages to inspire moral or societal change, often challenging established norms and existing structures. The concept of prophets extends beyond formal religion, as American sociologist Robert Merton applied the term "self-fulfilling prophecy" to describe how beliefs shape reality. Sociologists like Karl Marx and members of the Frankfurt School have also been described as secular prophets for their critical analyses of society and their efforts to predict and prescribe future social actions.

❖ TYPES OF PROPHET (DONALD SWENSON)

1. Ethical-Exemplary Prophet = A prophet who "models the path toward spiritual goodness." For example, Gautama Siddhartha Buddha (c.563–483 BC) "never claimed divine revelation, as his was a self-liberation through renunciation and enlightenment."
2. Founding Prophet = A prophet who "brings a new teaching and revelation." For example, Abraham (c.2000–1650 BC) "founded three monotheistic world religions that now encompass half the world's population."
3. Reforming Prophet = A prophet who "charismatically offers new life to a highly routinized institutional tradition." For example, John Calvin (1509–1564) "was actually more interested in reforming the Catholic Church than dividing it or separating from it."
4. Renewing Prophet = A prophet who "calls for a return to the original purity of a faith that is institutionally compromised and complacent." For example, Benedict of Nursia (c.480-c.547 AD).
5. Revolutionary Prophet = A prophet who "radically alters a religious tradition according to a new revelation." For example, Muhammad (c.570-c.632 AD) "broke from the mythological traditions of both Judaism and Christianity on several fronts."

❖ PROPHET VS. PRIEST (WEBER)

- PROPHET: "The radical minority who critique [traditional] messages and rituals, the change agents calling the faithful to a higher plane." "Prophets 'stimulate the moral imagination about both what is, and what if.'" They are "characterized by tensions in both their inner lives and in their relations with the external world." They tend to have "purer motivations" than priests because they "are free of organizational entanglements."

- PRIESTS: "The conservative majority of religious functionaries who faithfully repeat sacred messages and carry out sacred rituals." They are "products of routinization, and more concerned with status and prestige than with charisma"

Table 1

Characteristics	The Prophet	The Priest
Authority	A personal call	From sacred tradition
Source of authority	Personal revelation	Official office
Social origins	Outside of priestly class	Likely from priestly class
Remuneration	Little or none	Is paid for services
Education	Little or none	Theological training
Source of revelation	First-hand account	Second-hand account

The Table 1 shows the characteristics of Prophet and Priest.

- According to Donald Swenson, 'the focus of the priest is to secure some permanency of the message of the prophet, to ensure the economic existence of the enterprise, and to control the authority of the collective.'

WEBER VIEWS ON PROPHETS

In his book on religion, Weber has devoted a whole chapter to the understanding of what a prophet is. He defines the prophet as an individual who is capable of proclaiming a religious doctrine or a divine commandment because of his charismatic qualities. The major difference between the priest and prophet is that the prophet regards his mission as a "personal call" and derives his authority from personal revelation and charisma or an exceptional quality. The core of the prophet's mission is to carry forward the commandment or doctrine he has received as revelation. Often the prophet may use magic to establish his authority. The prophet is, usually successful and respected till his ability to convince and prove his uniqueness of purpose is intact. Prophets also engage in healing and counselling. Weber points out that the prophet usually does not belong to an organisation and neither does he receive economic rewards for his ideas. He is not a professional and has a following of disciples or a laity because they believe in his or have faith in him. The prophet makes prophecies which become often the guiding principles of a religious sect or cult or even an entire religious movement. The prophet besides making prophecies, is a teacher of religious and philosophical wisdom. To put it simply, the prophet may be seen as an individual who is an instrument for carrying forward the will of God and he is obeyed because of the ethical nature of his mission. He may also be a person who individually sets an example of attaining salvation as did Buddha.

3.12 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude religious gurus are spiritual guides who offer personalized wisdom, compassionate guidance, and moral teachings to help disciples achieve spiritual growth, self-realization, and a deeper connection to the divine. Their legacies often shape spiritual philosophies and influence society, though the role of the guru can also be met with skepticism and potential exploitation. A true guru is a self-realized individual, a catalyst for transformation, and a bridge between the seeker and the divine, providing solace and insight in a complex world.

4.0 Objectives

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with:

- Evolution of Religion
- Various Theories of Religion

4.1 Introduction

In the nineteenth century the sociology of religion was concerned with two main questions. ‘How did religion begin?’ and ‘How did religion evolve?’ This evolutionary approach was influenced by Darwin’s on The Origin of Species, published in 1859. Just as Darwin attempted to explain the origin and evolution of species, so sociologists tried to explain the origin and evolution of social institutions and society. In terms of religion, two main theories, animism and naturism, were advanced to account for its origin.

4.2 Theory of Animism, Naturism

Animism means the belief in spirits. Edward B. Tylor believes this to be the earliest form of religion. He argues that animism derives from man’s attempts to answer two questions, ‘What is it that makes the difference between a living body and a dead one?’ and ‘What are those human shapes which appear in dreams and visions?’ To make sense of these events, early philosophers invented the idea of the soul. The soul is a spirit being which leaves the body temporarily during dreams and visions, and permanently at death. Once invented, the idea of spirits was applied not simply to man, but also to many aspects of the natural and social environment. Thus, animals were invested with a spirit, as were man-made objects such as the bullroarer of the Australian aborigines. Tylor argues that religion, in the form of animism, originated to satisfy man's intellectual nature, to meet his need to make sense of death, dreams and visions.

Naturism means the belief that the forces of nature have supernatural power. F. Max Muller believes this to be the earliest form of religion. He argues that naturism arose from man's experience of nature, in particular the effect of nature upon man's emotions. Nature contains surprise, terror, marvels and miracles, such as volcanoes, thunder and lightning awed by the power and wonder of nature, early man transformed abstract forces into personal agents. Man, personified nature. The force of the wind became the spirit of the wind; the power of the sun became the spirit of the sun. Where animism seeks the origin of religion in man's intellectual needs, naturism seeks it in his emotional needs. Naturism is man's response to the effect of the power and wonder of nature upon his emotions.

From the origin of religion, nineteenth-century sociologists turned to its evolution. Several schemes were developed, Tylor's being one example. Tylor believed that human society evolved through five major stages, beginning with the simple hunting and gathering band, and ending with the complex nation state. In the same way, religion evolved through five stages, corresponding to the evolution of society. Animism, the belief of multitude of spirits, formed the religion of the simplest societies, monotheism, the belief in one supreme god, formed the religion of the most complex. Tylor believed that each stage in the evolution of religion arose from preceding ones and that the religion of modern man, 'is in great measure only explicable as a developed product of an older and ruder system'.

4.3 Let us sum up

Thus, to sum up there are many criticisms of the evolutionary approach. The origin of religion is lost in the past. The first indication of a possible belief in the supernatural dates from about 60,000 years ago. Archaeological evidence reveals that Neanderthal man in the Near East buried his dead with flowers, stone tools and jewellery. However, theories about the origin of religion can only be based on speculation and intelligent guesswork. Evolutionists such as Tylor and Muller came up with plausible reasons for why certain beliefs were held by members of particular societies but this does not necessarily explain why those beliefs originated in the first place. Nor can it be argued that all religions necessarily originated in the same way. In addition, the neat, precise stages for the evolution of religion do not fit the facts. As Andrew Lang points out, many of the simplest societies have religions based on monotheism, which Tylor claimed was limited to modern societies.

5.2 Introduction

It was during 18th and 19th centuries that it was a belief in the field of religion that religion is the result of civilization. In other words, religion only emerged from civilization.

Such an understanding about religion was denied by the anthropological findings of Malinowski, E.B. Tylor, and others. They reported that the primitive tribes had definite ideas about the origin of religion. Their approach was functional. In fact, the origin of religion is explained by two perspectives. One is functional and second is dialectical, that is, Marxist. The religion which originated from tribals says that when the Trobriand islanders went for fishing in the sea they were confronted with several unforeseen hazards. This motivated the tribals to express their belief to magic and super natural. Because there was need for religion their emerged religion. In this lesson we will discuss the origin of religion from the perspective of functionalism. It is here also that we will examine the evolution of religion from the perspective of Durkheim and Max Weber.

5.3 Origin of Religion

18th century was the century of evolutionary theory. Not only Durkheim and Max Weber Karl Marx also contributed to the theory of evolution.

The functionalist perspective examines religion in terms of society's needs. Functionalist analysis is primarily concerned with the contribution religion makes to meeting these needs. From this perspective, society requires a certain degree of social solidarity, value consensus, and harmony and integration between its parts. The function of religion is the contribution it makes to meet such functional prerequisites—for example, its contribution to social solidarity.

5.4 The Sacred and the Profane

In The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life, first published in 1912, Emile Durkheim presented what is probably the most influential interpretation of religion from a functionalist perspective (Durkheim, 1961).

Durkheim argued that all societies divide the world into two categories: the sacred and the profane (the non-sacred). Religion is based upon this division. It is a unified system of beliefs and practices related to sacred things, that is, to say things set apart and forbidden. It is important to realize that:

By sacred thing one must not understand simply those personal things which are called gods or spirits; a rock, a tree, a spring, a pebble, a piece of wood, a house, in a word anything can be sacred.

There is nothing about the particular qualities of a pebble or a tree that makes them sacred. Therefore, sacred things must be symbols, they must represent something. To understand the role of religion in society, the relationship between sacred symbols and what they represent must be established.

5.5 Totemism

Durkheim used the religion of various groups of Australian aborigines to develop his argument. He saw their religion, which he called totemism, as the simplest and most basic form of religion.

Aboriginal society is divided into several clans. A clan is like a large extended family with its members sharing certain duties and obligations. For example, clans have a rule of exogamy—that is, members are not allowed to marry within the clan. Clan members have a duty to aid and assist each other: they join together to mourn the death of one of their number and to revenge a member who has been wronged by someone from another clan.

Each clan has a totem, usually an animal or a plant. This totem is then represented by drawings made on wood or stone. These drawings are called churingas. Usually, churingas are at least as sacred as the species which they represent and sometimes more so. The totem is a symbol. It is the emblem of the clan. It is its flag; it is the sign by which each clan distinguishes it from all others. However, the totem is more than the churinga which represents it—it is the most sacred object in aborigine ritual. The totem is ‘The outward and visible form of the totemic principle or god.’

Durkheim argued that if the totem is at once the symbol of God and of the society, is that not because the god and the society are only one?”

Thus, he suggested that in worshipping god, people are in fact worshipping society. Society is the real object of religious veneration.

How does humanity come to worship society? Sacred things are considered superior in dignity and power to profane things and particularly to man.’ In relation to the sacred, humans are inferior and dependent. This relationship between humanity and sacred things is exactly the relationship between humanity and society. Society is more important and powerful than the individual. Durkheim argued that Primitive man comes to view society as something sacred because he is utterly dependent on it.

But why does humanity not simply worship society itself? Why does it invent a sacred symbol like a totem? Because Durkheim argued, it is easier for a person to ‘visualize and direct his feelings of awe toward a symbol than towards so complex a thing as a clan.’

5.6 Religion and the ‘Collective Conscience’

Durkheim believed that social life is impossible without the shared values and moral beliefs that form the collegiate conscience. In their absence, there would be no social order, social control, and social solidarity or cooperation. In short, there would be no society. Religion reinforces the collective conscience. The worship of society strengthens the values and the moral beliefs that form the basis of social life. By defining them as sacred, religion provides them with greater power to direct human action.

This attitude of respect towards the sacred is the same attitude applied to social duties and obligations. In worshipping society, people are, in effect, recognizing the importance of the social group and their dependence upon it. In this way religion strengthens the unity of the group: it promotes social solidarity.

Durkheim emphasized the importance of collective worship. The social group comes together in religious rituals full of drama and reverence. Together, its members express their faith in common values and beliefs. In this highly charged atmosphere of collective worship, the integration of society is strengthened. Members of society express communicate and understand the moral bonds which unite them.

According to Durkheim, the belief in gods or spirits, which usually provide the focus for religious ceremonies, originated from belief in the ancestral spirits of dread relatives. The worship of gods is really the worship of ancestors' souls. Since Durkheim also believed that souls represent the presence of social values, the collective conscience is present in individuals. It is through individual souls that the collective conscience is realized. Since religious worship involves the worship of souls. Durkheim again concludes that religious worship is really the worship of the social group or society.

- Criticism of Durkheim

Durkheim has explained the origin of religion from the tribals. The tribals taken by him were of a typical of other tribals. Most sociologists believe that Durkheim has overstated his case. While agreeing that religion is important for promoting social solidarity and reinforcing social values, they would not support his view that religion is the worship of society. Durkheim's views on religion are more relevant to small, on- literate societies, where there is a close integration of culture and social institutions, where work, leisure, education and family life tend to merge and where members share a common belief and value system. His views are less relevant to modern societies, which have many subcultures social and ethnic groups, specialized organizations and arrange of religious beliefs, practices and institutions. As Malcolm Hamilton puts it, the emergence of religious pluralism and diversity within a society is, of course, something that Durkheim's theory has great difficulty dealing with (Hamilton, 1995).

Durkheim may also overstate the degree to which the collective conscience permeates and shapes the behaviour of individuals. Indeed, sometimes-religious beliefs can be at odds with and override societal values. Malcolm Hamilton makes this point strongly:

The fact that our moral sense might make us go against the majority, the society, or authority shows that we are not quite so dependent upon or creatures of society as Durkheim claims. Society, powerful as it is, does not have the primacy, its Durkheim believes it has. Ironically, it often seems to be the case that religious beliefs can have a much greater influence upon and hold over the individual than society does since it is often out of religious convections that individuals will fly in the face of society or attempt to withdraw from it, as in the case of many sectarian movements.

5.7 Malinowski's Perspective on Origin of Religion

Like Durkheim, Malinowski uses data from small-scale non-literate societies to develop his thesis on religion. Many of his examples are drawn from his fieldwork in the Trobriand Islands off the coast of

New Guinea. Like Durkheim, Malinowski sees religion as reinforcing social norms and values and promoting social solidarity.

Unlike Durkheim, however, he does not see religion as reflecting society as a whole, nor does he see religious ritual as the worship of society itself. Malinowski identifies specific areas of social life with which religion is concerned, and to which it is addressed. These are situations of emotional stress that threaten social solidarity.

- Religion and life crises

Anxiety and tension tend to disrupt social life. Situations that produce these emotions include crises of life such as birth, puberty, marriage and death. Malinowski notes that in all societies these life crises are surrounded with religious ritual. He sees death as the most disruptive of these events and argues that:

The existence of strong personal attachments and the fact of death, which of all human events is the most upsetting and disorganizing to man's calculations, are perhaps the main sources of religious beliefs.

Religion deals with the problem of death in the following manner. A funeral ceremony expresses the belief in immortality which denies the fact of death and so comforts the bereaved. Other mourners support the bereaved by their presence at the ceremony. This comfort and support check the emotions which death produces and control the stress and anxiety that might disrupt society. Death is socially destructive since it removes a member from society. At a funeral ceremony the social group units to support the bereaved. This expression of social solidarity reintegrates society.

5.8 Religion, prediction and control

A second category of events—an undertaking that cannot be fully controlled or predicted by practical means—also produces tension and anxiety. From his observations in the Trobriand Islands, Malinowski noted that such events were surrounded by ritual.

Fishing is an important subsistence practice in the Trobriands. Malinowski observed that in the calm waters of the lagoon 'fishing is done in an easy and absolutely reliable manner by the method of poisoning, yielding abundant results without danger and uncertainty.' However, beyond the barrier reef in the open sea there is danger and uncertainty: a storm may result in loss of life and the catch is dependent on the presence of a shoal of fish, which cannot be predicted. In the lagoon, where man can rely completely on his knowledge and skill; there are no rituals associated with fishing whereas fishing in the open sea is preceded by rituals to ensure a good catch and protect the fishermen. Although Malinowski refers to these rituals as magic, others argue that it is reasonable to regard them as religious practices.

Again, we see ritual used for specific situations that produce anxiety. Rituals reduce anxiety by providing confidence and a feeling of control. As with funeral ceremonies, fishing rituals are social events. The group unites to deal with situations of stress, and so the unity of the group is strengthened.

Therefore, we can summarize by saying that Malinowski's distinctive contribution to the sociology of religion is his argument that religion promotes social solidarity by dealing with situations of emotional stress that threaten the stability of society.

5.9 Criticisms of Malinowski

Malinowski has been criticized for exaggerating the importance of religious rituals in helping people to cope with situations of stress and uncertainty. Tambiah (1990, discussed in Hamilton, 1995) points out, for example, that magic and elaborate rituals are associated with the cultivation of taro and yams on the Trobriand Islands. This is related to the fact that taro and yams are important because men must use them to make payments to their sisters' husbands. Men who fail to do so show that they are unable to fulfill significant social obligations. These rituals are therefore simply related to the maintenance of prestige in that society and have little to do with cementing solidarity or dealing with uncertainty and danger. A particular function or effect that religion sometimes has been mistaken for a feature of religion in general.

5.10 Let us sum up

Durkheim concluded that religion is a fundamental, sacred social institution that generates collective representations and fosters social solidarity and cohesion by distinguishing the sacred from the profane. He argued that while deified deities are societal projections, the decline of traditional religion doesn't end society but rather requires individuals to directly acknowledge their dependence on the social order, which religion previously symbolized.

The main objectives of this lesson are:

- To give knowledge about Weber perspective on religion.
- To provide information about the relationship between religion and economy.

6.1 Introduction

Max Weber is a great theoretician in the field of religion. He was an evolutionary functionalist. His book The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1958) are very important. As a matter of fact, Weber has contributed in a major way on the development of religion. Admittedly, Marxist and functionalist both have contributed immensely on the function of religion. What distinguishes Weber from Marxist is that the former has established that ideas can also change the world. It was denial of Marxist's thesis. In this part of the lesson, we will discuss the Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism.

Both functionalists and Marxists emphasize the role of religion in promoting social integration and impeding social change. In contrast, Weber (1958, first published in English 1930) argued that in some circumstances religion can lead to social change, although shared religious beliefs might integrate a social group, those same beliefs may have repercussions which in the long term can produce changes in society.

Max is generally regarded as a materialist. He believed that the material world (and particularly people's involvement with nature as they worked to secure their own survival) shaped their beliefs. Thus, to Marx, the economic system largely determined the beliefs that were held by individuals. In Marxist terms the mode of production determined the type of religion that would be dominant in any society.

Unlike Marx, Weber rejected the view that religion is always shaped by economic factors. He did not deny that, at certain times and in certain places, religion may be largely shaped by economic forces, but he denied that this is always the case. Under certain conditions the reverse can occur, that is, religious beliefs can be a major influence on economic behaviour.

Weber's social action theory argues that human action is directed by meanings and motives. From this perspective, action 'can only be understood by appreciating the world view—the image or picture of the world held by members of society. From their worldview, individuals obtain meanings purposes and motives that direct their actions. Religion is often an important component of a world view. In certain places and times, religious meaning and purposes can direct action in a wide range of context. In particular, religious beliefs can direct economic action.

6.2 Capitalism and Ascetic Protestantism

In his most famous book, The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1958), Weber examines the relationship between the rise of certain forms of Protestantism and the development of Western industrial capitalism. In the first part of his argument Weber tries to demonstrate that a particular form of Protestantism, ascetic Calvinist Protestantism, preceded the development of capitalism. He also tries to show that capitalism developed initially in areas where this religion was influential. Other areas of the world possessed many of the necessary prerequisites yet they were not amongst the first areas to develop capitalism. For example, India and China had technological knowledge, labour to be hired, and individuals engaged in making money. What they lacked according to Weber was a religion that encouraged and facilitated the development of capitalism. The first capitalist nations emerged among the countries of Western Europe and North America that had Calvinist religious groups. Furthermore, most of the earliest capitalist entrepreneurs in these areas came from the ranks of Calvinists.

Having established a relationship —a correlation between Calvinism and capitalism—by comparing religion and economic development in different parts of the world. Weber goes on to explain how and why this type of religion was linked to capitalism.

Calvinist Protestantism originated in the beliefs of John Calvin in the seventeenth century. Calvin thought that there was a distinct group of the elect—those chosen to go to heaven—and that they had been chosen by God even before they were born. Those who were not among the elect could never gain a place in heaven however well they behaved on earth.

Other versions of Christianity derived from the beliefs of Martin Luther. Luther believed that individual Christians could affect their chances of reaching heaven the way that they behaved on earth. It was very important for Christians to develop faith in God, and to act out God's willed on earth. In order to do this, they had to be dedicated to their calling in life. Whatever position in society God had given them, they must conscientiously carryout the appropriate duties.

At first sight, Lutheranism seems the doctrine more likely to produce capitalism. However, it encouraged people to produce or earn no more than was necessary for their material needs. It attached more importune to piety and faith than to the accumulation of great wealth.

The doctrine of predestination advocated by Calvin seems less likely to produce capitalism. If certain individuals were destined for heaven regardless of their earthly behaviour—and the rest were equally unable to overcome their damnation—there would be little point in hard work on earth.

Weber points out, though, that Calvinists had a psychological problem: they did not know whether they were amongst the elect. They suffered from a kind of inner loneliness or uncertainty about their status, and their behaviour was not an attempt to earn a place in heaven, but rather to convince them that they had been chosen to go there. They reasoned that only the chosen people of God would be able to live a good life on earth. If their behaviour was exemplary, they could feel confident that they would go to heaven after death.

Therefore, the interpretation that the Calvinists put on the doctrine of predestination contributed to them becoming the first capitalists.

- The Protestant Ethic

The Protestant ethic which Weber describes (and which enabled Calvinists to convince themselves that they were amongst the elect) developed first in seventeenth- century Western Europe. The ethic was ascetic, encouraging abstinence from life's pleasures, an austere lifestyle and rigorous self-discipline. It produced individuals who worked hard in their careers or callings, in a single-minded manner. Making money was a concrete indication of success in one's calling, and success in one's calling meant that the individual had not lost grace in God's sight. John Wesley, a leader of the great Methodist revival that preceded the expansion of English industry at the close of the 18th century, wrote:

For religion must necessarily produce industry and frugality, and these cannot but produce riches. We must exhort all Christians to gain what they can and to save all they can; that is, kin effect to grow rich.

These riches could not be spent on luxuries, fine clothes, lavish houses and frivolous entertainment but in the glory of God. In effect, this meant being even more successful in terms of one's calling, which in practice meant reinvesting profits in the business.

The Protestants attacked time wasting, laziness, idle gossip and more sleep than was necessary six to eight hours a day at the most. They frowned on sexual pleasures; sexual intercourse should remain within marriage and then only for the procreation of children (a vegetable diet and cold baths were sometimes recommended to remove temptation). Sport and recreation were accepted only for improving fitness and health and condemned if pursued for entertainment. The impulsive fun and enjoyment of the pub, dance hall, theatre and gaming house were prohibited to ascetic Protestants. In fact, anything that might divert or distract people from their calling was condemned. Living life in terms of these guidelines was an indication that the individual had not lost grace and favour in the sight of God.

- The spirit of capitalism

Weber claimed that the origins of the spirit of capitalism were to be found in the ethic of ascetic Protestantism. Throughout history there has been no shortage of those who sought money and profit: pirates, prostitutes and moneylenders in every corner of the world had always pursued wealth. However, according to Weber, both the manner and purpose of their pursuit of money were at odds with the spirit of capitalism.

Traditionally, money seekers engaged in speculative projects: they gambled in order to gain rewards. If successful they tended to spend money frivolously on personal consumption. Furthermore, they were not dedicated to making money for its own sake. Weber argued that labourers who had earned enough for their family to live comfortably, and merchants who had secured the luxuries they desired, would feel no need to push themselves harder to make more money. Instead, they sought free time for leisure.

The ascetic Protestant had a quite different attitude to wealth, and Weber believed that this attitude was characteristic of capitalism. He argued that the essence of capitalism is the pursuit of profit and forever renewed profit.

Capitalist enterprises are organized on national bureaucratic lines. Business transactions are conducted in a systematic and rational manner with costs and projected profits being carefully assessed.

Underlying the practice of capitalism is the spirit of capitalism—a set of ideas, ethics and values. Weber illustrates the spirit of capitalism with quotes from two books by Benjamin Franklin, Necessary Hints to Those that would be Rich (1736) and Advice to a young tradesman (1748). Franklin writes ‘Remember that time is money’, Time wasting idleness and diversion lose money. Remember that credit is money. A reputation for prudence and honesty will bring credit, as a will paying debts on time. Business people should behave with industry and frugality, and punctuality and justice in all their dealings.

Weber argued that this spirit of capitalism is not simply a way of making money, but a way of life, which has ethics, duties and obligations. He claimed that ascetic Protestantism was a vital influence in the creation and development of the spirit and practice of capitalism: a methodical and single-minded pursuit of a calling encourages rational capitalism. Weber wrote that ‘restless, continuous systematic work in a worldly calling must have been the most powerful conceivable lever for the expansion of the spirit of capitalism. Making money became both a religious and a business ethic. The Protestant interpretation of profit making justified the activities of the businessman.

Weber claimed that two major features of capitalist industry—the standardization of production and the specialized division of labour—were encouraged by Protestantism. The Protestant uniformity of life immensely aids the capitalist in the standardization of production. The emphasis on the importance of a fixed calling provided an ethical justification for this modern specialized division of labour.

Finally, Weber noted the importance of the creation of wealth and the restrictions on spending it, which encouraged saving and reinvestment:

When the limitation of consumption is combined with this release of acquisitive activity, the inevitable result is obvious: accumulation of capital through an ascetic compulsion to save. The restraints that were imposed on the consumption of wealth naturally served to increase it, by making possible the productive investment of capital.

The ascetic Protestant way of life led to the accumulation of capital, investment and reinvestment. It produced the early businesses that expanded to create capitalist society.

6.3 Materialism and Weber's Theory

Weber, then, believed that he had discovered and demonstrated that religious beliefs could cause economic change. He claimed that he had found a weakness in Marx's materialism which implied that the economic system always shaped ideas.

However, it should be stressed that Weber did not discount the importance of the economy and material factors. He said, 'It is of-course, not my aim to substitute for a one-sided materialistic an equally one-sided spiritualistic causal interpretation of culture and of history. Capitalism was made possible not just by Calvinist Protestantism, but also by the technology and economic system of the countries in which it developed. Material factors were as important as ideas in its development; neither could be ignored in any explanation.

6.4 Religion, modernity and rationality

As well as proposing an explanation for the origins of capitalism, Weber also had a good deal to say about the likely consequences of the changes produced by the development of Protestantism. His theories have had a tremendous influence on general ideas about changes in Western societies, and in particular on the concepts of modernity and secularization. Modernity refers to both a historical period and a type of society, which is often seen as developing along with industrialization, science and capitalism. Secularization refers to the decline of religion. Robert Holton and Bryan Turner (1989), for example, argue that the central themes of all of Weber's sociology were the problems of modernization and modernity, and that we should regard rationalization as the process which produced modernism.

As we have seen above, in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism Weber argued that ascetic Protestantism helped to produce modern capitalism. With that went an emphasis on rational calculation since pursuing the maximum possible profit required an appraisal of the profits that would be produced by following different lines of action. The capitalist would then follow whatever path would produce the greatest profit. Weber distinguished between formal rationality and substantive rationality. Formal rationality involved calculating the best means to achieve a given end and the calculations had to be in a numerical form. Substantive rationality involved action designed to meet some ultimate goal, such as justice, equality or human happiness. Capitalist behaviour put primary emphasis upon the formal rationality of accounting in the pursuit of profit maximization. Substantive rationality, including the morality provided by religious beliefs, tended to fade into the background in capitalist societies.

To Weber, rationality would not be confined to capitalist enterprise in the modern world. As Holton and Turner point out, it would also involve a rational legal system, the separation of the home and the work place, rational financial management and the emergence of a rational system of administration. Weber's ideas on bureaucracy are a good example of his belief that modern societies would be increasingly characterized by rationality. However, to Weber, and to many later sociologists rationality can be at odds with the faith that is required by religion.

Religions do not expect their followers to try to test their beliefs scientifically, nor do they expect religious beliefs to be based upon weighing up the costs and benefits of joining a religious group. Followers should simply believe in the truth of their religion. In the rationalized modern world, though Weber thought that it would be increasingly difficult for followers of religion to maintain their faith. Discussing Protestant sects in the USA, Weber said closer scrutiny revealed the steady progress of the characteristic process of secularization to which all phenomena that originated in religious conceptions succumb (Weber in Gerth and Mills (eds.), 1948). In short, ascetic Protestantism would contribute to the development of capitalism, which required a rational approach to social life, which would in turn undermine religion. Protestant religions therefore contained the seeds of their own destruction.

6.5 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude Once on its way, the modern economic system was able to support itself without the need of the religious ethic of ascetic Protestantism which in many ways could not help but sow the seeds of secularization in modern society by its own promotion of worldly activity and consequent expansion of wealth and material well-being. Calvinistic Protestantism was its own gravedigger.

The main objective of this lesson is to equip you with:

- Views of Marx on Religion

7.1 Introduction

D.N. Dhanagare in his book “Themes and Perspectives in Indian Sociology” argues that the essence of Marxism is dialectical materialism.

In his support he refers to the Marxist historian D.D. Kosambi. Marx argues that classes, class conflict and alienation are all due to dialectical materialism. In the field of religion, the Marxian perspective equally occupies an important place. Russia for long time did not have any church. In fact, religion was denied in socialist countries. It is in this respect that dialectical materialism needs all consideration. In the lesson we would discuss the Marxist perspective on religion.

In Marx’s vision of the ideal society, exploitation and alienation are things of the past. The means of production are communally owned, which results in the disappearance of social classes. Members of society are fulfilled as human beings: they control their own destinies and work together for the common good. Religion does not exist in this communist utopia because the social conditions that produce it have disappeared.

To Marx, religion is an illusion which cures the pain produced by exploitation and oppression. It is a series of myths that justify and legitimate the subordination of the subject class and the domination and privilege of the ruling class. It is a distortion of reality which provides many of the deceptions that form the basis of ruling-class ideology and false class-consciousness.

7.2 Religion as ‘The Opium of the People’

In Marx’s words, ‘Religion is the sign of the oppressed creature, the sentiment of a heartless world and the soul of soulless conditions. It is the opium of the people (Marx, in Bottomore and Rubel, 1963). Religion acts as an opiate to dull the pain produced by oppression. It is both ‘an expression of real suffering and a protest against suffering,’ but it does little to solve the problem because it helps to make life more bearable and therefore dilutes demands for change. As such, religion merely stupefies its adherents rather than bringing them true happiness and fulfillment.

Similarly, Lenin argued ‘Religion is a kind of spiritual gin in which the slaves of capital drown their human shape and their claims to any decent life’ cited in Lane, 1970).

From a Marxist perspective, religion can dull the pain of oppression in the following ways:

- (1) It promises a paradise of eternal bliss in life after death. Engels argued that the appeal of Christianity to oppressed classes lies in its promise of salvation from bondage and misery in the afterlife. The Christian vision of heaven can make life on earth more bearable by giving people something to look forward to.
- (2) Some religions make a virtue of the suffering produced by oppression. In particular, those who bear the deprivations of poverty with dignity and humility will be rewarded for their virtue. This view is contained in the well-known biblical quotation, ‘It is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter the Kingdom of Heaven’. Religion thus makes poverty more tolerable by offering a reward for suffering and promising compensation for injustice in the afterlife.

- (3) Religion can offer the hope of supernatural intervention to solve the problems on earth. Members of religious groups such as the Jehovah's Witnesses live in anticipation of the day when the supernatural powers will descend from on high and create heaven on earth. Anticipation of this future can make the present more acceptable.
- (4) Religion often justifies the social order and a person's position within it. God can be seen as creating and ordaining the social structure, as in the following verse from the Victorian hymn

*All things bright and beautiful
The rich man in his castle
The poor man at his gate,
God made them high and lowly, and ordered their estate.*

In this way, social arrangement s appears inevitable. This can help those at the bottom of the stratification system to accept and come to terms with their situation. In the same way, poverty and misfortune in general have often been seen as divinely ordained as a punishment for sin. Again, the situation is defined as immutable and unchangeable. This can make life more bearable by encouraging people to accept their situation philosophically.

7.3 Religion and social control

From a Marxist viewpoint, religion does not simply cushion the effects of oppression; it is also an instrument of that oppression. It acts as a mechanism of social control, maintaining the existing system of exploitation and reinforcing class relationships. Put simply, it keeps people in their place. By making unsatisfactory lives bearable, religion tends to discourage people from attempting to change their situation. By offering an illusion of hope in a hopeless situation, it prevents thoughts of overthrowing the system. By providing explanations and justifications for social situations, religion distorts reality. It helps to produce a false class- consciousness that blinds members of the subject class to their true situation and their real interests. In this way it diverts people's attention from the real source of their oppression and so helps to maintain ruling class power.

Religion is not however, solely the province of oppressed groups. From a Marxist perspective, ruling classes adopt religious beliefs to justify their position both to themselves and to others. The lines 'God made them high and lowly / And ordered their estate show clearly how religion can be used to justify social inequality, not simply to the poor, but also to the rich. Religion is often directly supported by the ruling classes to further their interests. In the words of Max and Engels, 'the parson has ever gone hand in hand with the landlord'. In feudal England the lord of the manor's power was frequently legitimated by pronouncements from the pulpit. In return for this support, landlords would often richly endow the established church.

- Evidence to support Marxism

There is considerable evidence to support the Marxist view of the role of religion in society.

The caste system of traditional India was justified by Hindu religious beliefs. In medieval Europe, kings and queens ruled by divine right. The Egyptian Pharaohs went one step further by combining both God and king in the same person. Slave-owners in the southern states of America often approved of the conversion of slaves to Christianity, believing it to be a controlling and gentling influence. It has been argued that in the early days of the Industrial Revolution in England. Employers used religion as a means of controlling the masses and encouraging them to remain sober and to work hard.

A more recent example which can be used to support Marxism has been discussed by Steve Bruce (1988). He has pointed out that in the USA conservative Protestants—the New Christian Right—consistently support right-wing political candidates in the Republican Party and attack more liberal candidates in the Democratic Party. In 1980 they targeted 27 liberal candidates for attack; 23 of them lost. The New Christian Right supported Ronald Reagan in his successful campaign for the presidency in 1984. In the 1988 presidential campaign, however, Reagan was unsuccessfully challenged for the Republican nomination for president by a member of the New Christian Right, Pat Robertson. Robertson is one of a number of television evangelists who have tried to gain new converts to their brand of Christianity and who spread their political and moral messages through preaching on television.

According to Bruce, the new Christian Right have supported a more aggressive anti-communist foreign policy, more military spending, less central government interference, less welfare spending, and fewer restraints on free enterprise. Although Bruce emphasizes that they have had a limited influence on American politics, it is clear that they have tended to defend the interests of the rich and powerful at the expense of other groups in the population.

- The limitations of Marxism

Conflicting evidence suggests that religion does not always legitimate power; it is not simply a justification of alteration or a justification of privilege, and it can sometimes provide an impetus for change. Although this is not reflected in Marx's own writing, nor in much of Engels's earlier work, it is reflected in Engels's later work and in the perspectives on religion advanced by more recent neo-Marxists. We will examine these views after the next section, which considers the relationship between religion and communism.

Furthermore, the fact that religion sometimes act as an ideological force in the way suggested by Marx, does not explain the existence of religion. As Malcolm Hamilton points out:

To say, however, that religion can be turned into an instrument of manipulation is no more to explain it than saying that because art or drama can be utilized for ideological purposes this explains art or drama.

In contrast, approaches such as those used by Stark and Bainbridge (1985) do try to find an explanation for the almost universal presence of religion in society in basic human needs. Their views will be examined shortly.

7.4 Religion and communism

Marx stated that 'Religion is only the illusory sun which revolves round man as long as he does not revolve round himself (Marx and Engels, 1957). In a truly socialist society individuals revolve around themselves, and religion- along with all other illusions and distortions of reality-disappears.

Whatever the merits of this prophecy, it certainly does not reflect the situation in the socialist Israeli kibbutzim. Many kibbutzim are fervently religious and their members appear to experience no contradiction between religion and socialism.

In the USSR communism the strength of religion was harder to gauge. After the revolution of 1917 the communist state placed limit on religious activity and ate times persecuted religious people. Soviet law restricted religious worship to designated churches and other places of prayer. Religious instruction of children was banned. Geoffrey Hosking estimated that there were more than 50,000 Russian Orthodox churches before the 1917 revolution, but by 1939 only about 4,000 remained (Hosking, 1988). Writing in 1970, David Lane claimed that there were about 20,000 Russian Orthodox churches inn 1960, but nearly half of these had been closed by 1965 due to the policies of Khrushchev.

On the surface such figures suggest that religion had declined, but this may have been due to the activities of the ruling elite rather than to a loss of faith by the population. Lane claimed that religion probably had little hold over the population, but it had, nevertheless shown certain resilience to communism. The resilience was reflected in one estimate which placed the number of baptized Orthodox Christians in the period 1947- 57 at 90 million, which is roughly the same as in 1914. In 1988 Geoffrey Hoskins argued that 'The Soviet Union is already a much more "religious" country than Britain or most of Western Europe'.

When president Gorbachov instituted a policy of glasnost, or openness, restrictions on religion were relaxed. In 1989 and 1990, unrest in a number of Soviet republics suggested the continued strength of religious belief. The Roman Catholic Church in Lithuania was one source of demands for independence. In 1990 conflict between Soviet Muslims in Azerbaijan and Soviet Christians in Armenia led to troops being deployed to restore order.

When the USSR began to divide and Communist Party rule was abandoned, religious convictions became even more evident. In 1991 David Martin described how church bells were used to summon millions of people to link arms around the Baltic states of Latvia, Lithuania and Estonia. In other former communist countries, there were enormous gatherings in Poland to celebrate the feast of the Assumption and the passionate pilgrimages of the Serbs to monastic shrines at Kosova (Martin, 1991b).

Opinion poll figures suggest that religion remained important to large proportions of the population during the communist eras in the USSR and Eastern Europe and that religion has become stronger since the demise of communism. Quoting data from the International Social Survey Program, Andrew Greely notes that in 1991, 47 per cent of the Russian population claimed to believe in God (Greeley, 1994). The strength of the religious revival is revealed by the fact that 22 per cent of the populations were former non-believers who had converted to a belief in God. Similarly, Miklos Tomka found that in 1978, 44.3 per cent of the population of Hungary claimed to be religious and that this had risen to 76.8 per cent by August 1993 (Tomka, 1995).

One society which has retained communism throughout the 1990s is Fidel Castro's Cuba. However, even such a staunch communist as Castro was forced to acknowledge the continuing appeal of religion when he invited Pope John Paul to Cuba in January 1998. The Pope addressed large and enthusiastic crowds, suggesting that Roman Catholicism remained strong despite some 40 years in which the communist state had discouraged religious participation and belief.

These examples suggest that there is more to religion than a set of beliefs and practices which develop in societies based on the private ownership of the means of production.

Materialistic dialectical approach has been not only to Marx only. There is other Marxist theorist such as Engels and neo-Marxists. We will now provide an analysis of these neo-Marxist according to which religion is considered as a radical force.

- Engels and Neo-Marxists-religion as a radical force

Roger O Toole, commenting on the Marxist sociology of religion, argues that Beginning with the work of Engels, Marxists have undoubtedly recognized the active role that may be played by religion in effecting revolutionary social change (O'Toole, 1984). Thus, in On the History of Early Christianity, Engels compared some of the early Christian sects that opposed Roman rule to communist and socialist political movements (Marx and Engels, 1957). He said, 'Christianity got hold of the masses exactly as modern socialism does, under the shape of a variety of sects. While Christianity originated as a way of coping with exploitation among oppressed groups, it could become a source of resistance to the oppressors and thus a force for change.'

- Otto Maduro – the relative autonomy of religion

Maduro is a contemporary neo-Marxist. While accepting many aspects of Marx's analysis of religion, he places greater emphasis on the idea that religion has some independence, or 'relative autonomy', from the economic system of the bourgeoisie (Maduro, 1982). He denies that religion is always conservative force and, indeed, claims that it can be revolutionary. He says, 'Religion is not necessarily a functional, reproductive or conservative factor in society; it often is one of the main (and sometimes the only) available channel to bring about a social revolution.'

Maduro claims that up until recently, Catholicism in Latin America tended to support the bourgeoisie and right-wing military dictatorships, which have represented its interests. The Catholic Church has tended to deny the existence of social conflicts between oppressive and oppressed classes. It has recognized some injustices, such as poverty and illiteracy, but has suggested that the solution lies with those who already have power.

The Catholic Church has also supported members of the clergy who have assisted private enterprise and government projects; it has celebrated military victories but failed to support unions, strikes and opposition political parties.

On the other hand, more recently, Catholic priests have increasingly demonstrated their autonomy from the bourgeoisie by criticizing them and acting against their interest, Maduro believes that members of the clergy can develop revolutionary potential where oppressed members of the population have no outlet for their grievances. They pressurize priests to take up their cause, and theological disagreements within a church can provide interpretations of a religion that are critical of the rich and powerful.

All of these conditions have been met in Latin America and have led to their development of liberation theology.

- Bryan S. Turner – A Materialist theory of religion

Bryan Turner (1983) follows Marx in arguing that religion rises from a material base: that is, he agrees that religion relates to the physical and economic aspects of social life. Unlike Marx, however, Turner does not believe that religion has a universal role in society, nor does he believe that religion is always an important part of ruling class ideological control. He questions the belief that religion has always been a powerful force persuading subject classes to accept the status quo.

7.5 Religion and Feudalism

Marxists have tended to assume that, in the feudal period, religion (in particular, Roman Catholicism in Europe) was a belief system that played a fundamental part in integrating society. Turner rejects the view that religion was as important for serfs and peasants as it was for feudal lords. On the basis of historical evidence, he claims that the peasantry was largely indifferent to religion: their main concern was simply survival.

By comparison, religion played an important part in the lives of the ruling class, the feudal lords. In feudalism, wealth consisted of, and power derived from the ownership of land by private individuals. For the ruling class to maintain its dominance it had to pass on property to an heir. Usually, a system of primogeniture was used: the eldest son of a landowner inherited all his father's land. This prevented the splitting up of estates, which would have reduced the concentration of power in the hands of particular individuals. It was therefore vital to the workings of feudalism and the maintenance of a dominant class that there was a legitimate male heir for each landowner. Premarital promiscuity and adultery both jeopardized the production of such an heir. Marriage and the legitimacy of children were propped up and defended by the church. Thus, in Turner's words, 'religion has the function of controlling the sexuality of the body in order to secure regular transmission of property via the family'. Without religion it would have been difficult to ensure there were recognized legitimate heirs who could retain concentrated landholdings in their family's possession.

A secondary function of religion under feudalism also stemmed from primogeniture. There was a surplus of younger sons who did not inherit land. In military feudalism, sons might meet an early death, so it was necessary to have a number of heirs in case one or more were killed. But those who did not receive an inheritance had to have some means of support. Monasteries provided one solution to the problem of the surplus males.

7.6 Religion and capitalism

Turner believes that, in modern capitalism, religion has lost the one vital function that it had for the ruling class. Today, he claims, individual and family property is much less important for the maintenance of ruling-class power. Property has become depersonalized—most wealth is concentrated in the hands of organizations (such as banks, pension funds and multinational corporations) rather than in the hands of individuals. In these circumstances, religion is no more than an optional extra for modern capitalist societies. Since the transmission of property via the family is no longer vital to the system, society can tolerate, and the church can accept, divorce and illegitimacy.

Turner's views on religion are similar to the more general views on the dominant ideology thesis advanced by Abercrombie, Hill and Turner (1980). They believe that modern capitalist societies do not possess a widely-accepted ruling-class ideology and that such an ideology is not necessary for the continuance of capitalist domination: the ruling class use coercion and naked economic power to maintain their position. Abercrombie et al. therefore question Marx's beliefs about the importance of religion in producing false class consciousness in capitalist societies.

7.7 Let us sum up

Having discussed Marxist and materialist views on religion, we will now turn to a consideration of the relationship between gender and religion. Some feminist theories of religion have similarities with Marxist theories.

8.1 INTRODUCTION

Religion is usually defined as a social-cultural system of designated behaviours and practices, morals, beliefs, worldviews, texts, sanctified places, prophecies, ethics, or organizations, which generally relates humanity to supernatural, transcendental, and spiritual elements; however, there is no scholarly consensus. Mahatma Gandhiji believed that all great religions were fundamentally equal and there should be innate respect for them, not just mutual tolerance. He felt a person wanting to convert should try to be a good follower of his own faith rather than seek goodness in change of faith. Gandhi wrote that he was a Hindu because he was born in Hinduism, because it is the most tolerant and inclusive of all religions and because non-violence has found the highest expression in Hinduism. He also mentioned that he did not think of Buddhism and Jainism as different from Hinduism. Religion was central to Gandhi's life, thought work and he regarded Politics as applied religion. However, his religious ideas were complex and his writings varied all to the occasion. His views on Religion were subject to change.

8.2 MAHATMA GANDHI VIEWS ON RELIGION

As had already been mentioned, Gandhi was of the firm opinion that man cannot live without religion. Gandhi expressed the view that, man without religion is man without roots. Therefore, religion is the basis on which all life structure has to be erected, if life is to be real". According to him, the problems from national to international, political to moral are best solved by religion. D.K. Dutta says, „Gandhi was of the opinion that religion is the root or key to all these problems. These can be solved in and through religion. It can be stressed that Gandhi breathed religion". Religion was the basis, inspiration and mainspring of all his activities. Further, his belief in God may be termed as the mainspring of his religious consciousness. Gandhi's insistence was more on the moralistic dimension since man, being inherently good and divine, needs to progress towards self-realisation, which is a much higher goal than that of industrialising society or pursuing material wealth and wants. The very existence of man is based on such ethical values that can be strengthened by his faith in God and religion that encompasses unity and harmony. The ethical values thus enhance the development of an individual and the absence of the same trigger's dehumanisation. With the pursuit of materialism replacing ethical values, man stoops to much lower levels antithetic to the very purpose of his life and existence that has a spiritual goal. Further, materialistic pursuits weaken the rationality and wisdom in man, giving way to chaos and confusion, and finally leading to crisis and unrest.

Gandhi advocated faith in religion and God to prevent mankind to slip into the life of misery and treachery. Moreover, the so-called development of science and technology, which the scientists proclaim as an essential means to progress of man have failed in their promise of greater happiness to mankind. With the human mind becoming prey to prejudices, passions and aggression, the virtues of love, humanity and sympathy have been relegated to the background causing untold misery to mankind. Gandhi tried to interpret religion as the solution to such problems. Gandhi advocated that philosophy, religion and spirituality should go hand in hand with other aspects. Precisely, for this reason, he linked religion with politics and other activities. As he said, „I must try to live in society and yet remain untouched by its pitfalls".

Gandhi's religion was not a formal religion, not Hindu religion; not a mere uttering of the name of God; neither customary nor narrow and definitely not the practice of untouchability. Religion, as Gandhi viewed it, meant self-realisation, knowledge of self, where God rules every breath, that which prompts us to follow the path of truth and non-violence, that which deals with „the science of soul“ and that which is in consonance with the obedience to the Law of God. This is inherent in every individual and binds him closer to God. To him, truth and non-violence are eternal, equal to religion, equal to God. Religion, as Gandhi felt, expresses itself with the help of these two concepts. No doubt, Gandhi advocated strict adherence to these two virtues that are much crucial in taking man closer to God. Religion thus holds an impermeable place in our life.

• GANDHI VIEWS ON RELIGIONS

Gandhi accorded equal respect and interest for all the religions of the world. To him, all religions are more or less true, proceed from the same God and converge to the same point. He had some interesting interactions with people from other religions, following different faiths. Gandhi viewed in all religions a basic unity, simplicity and humanity, an essential teaching of all religions.

1. ON ISLAM

Gandhi observed Islam „to be a religion of peace“, love and above all, that of brotherhood of man. He was very much impressed with its tenets of faith in only the God and its unqualified submission to God (K.N. Tiwari, World Religions and Gandhi, p.33). Gandhi was firmly convinced that the taking up of sword by some of its followers had nothing to do with, nor in accordance with the teaching of the holy book „Koran“. He also decried the charges of fanaticism on Islam, as many of the passages in the Holy Book speak of religious tolerance and peace. Gandhi remarked that, „my association with the noblest of Mussalmans has taught me to see that Islam has spread not by the power of the sword, but by the prayerful love of an unbroken line of its saints and fakirs“.

Gandhi was drawn to some of the most tolerant and universalistic tenets of Islam. Firstly, it speaks of the spiritual upliftment of all human beings and secondly, by assigning the role of messenger rather than attributing divinity to Prophet Mohammed; the religion has displayed its simplicity and purity, making it a pure monotheistic religion. The sufferings and humiliation on The Prophet, which were endured in graceful silence, impressed Gandhi. To him, suffering was an example of peaceful and non-violent approach, the prominent characteristic of a Satyagrahi. Gandhi was also attracted by the blending of politics and religion in the history of Islam, the principles he held close to his heart. Tiwari observes that „Gandhi found in the history of Islam, the blending of the political with the religious and this perhaps reassured him in his faith that politics could not be separated from religion and that the political struggle required long and patient suffering“. Islam highlighted the virtue of prayer, fasting, almsgiving, hospitality and code of personal conduct. This had a profound impact on Gandhi and found many of the injunctions of the discipline of Brahmacharya / Celibacy. Virtues like obedience to parents, avoidance of adultery, cheating and lying, refraining from theft, murder, etc. are also emphasised in Islam to which Gandhi too prescribed in the code of ethical virtues.

2.GANDHI'S VIEWS ON CHRISTIANITY

Gandhi was much impressed and inspired by Christianity as it contained the gospel of love and a spirit of sacrifice. His Satyagraha which was a forceful non-violent means to conquer evil was based on some of the tenets of Christianity. The gospel of personal suffering to win over the enemy was a lesson that was learnt by his readings of The New Testament. He was deeply touched by the „Sermon on the Mount“, which he considered „as the gift of Christianity“ to the world. To him, it was almost akin to the reading of „The Gita“. He was convinced that the „Christianity“s particular contribution is that of active love. No other religion says so firmly that God is love“. Gandhi revered Jesus for his practice of true love and non-violence, whose life was a living example of love and sacrifice towards all. To Gandhi, „Jesus on the cross chose to meet evil unarmed and unafeard with love and good will for even those who were ready to kill him“. It is this spirit of sacrifice that had a deep impact on Gandhi“s mind. Gandhi, at the same time, did not like that the true principles of Christianity were not adhered to by its followers. As he affirmed, the Western Christianity, „in its practical working, was a negation of Christ“s“ Christianity. I cannot conceive Jesus, if he was living in the flesh in our midst, approving of modern Christian Organisation, or public worship“. He advocated the equality of all religions, tolerance and sympathy for all.

Gandhi“s interactions with the Christian brethren during his stay in London and South Africa brought him closer to them in his effort to imbibe the teachings. But he requested those who were forthcoming to convert Indians to Christianity to refrain from conversion. To him, a man of any religion should be a better human being. At the same time, Gandhi was pleased to see some of the Christians change their views for the better, who made efforts to recognise the merits of other religions. Gandhi, through his correspondence with Tolstoy, endeavoured to deepen his understanding of The New Testament; Tolstoy“s „The Kingdom of God is within you“ awakened in him a passionate spirit of love and sacrifice. Gandhi“s interactions with C.F. Andrews and H.S. Polak further helped him in fostering a spirit of brotherhood and develop special kinship with them. Since all religions were equal to him, he venerated them without distinction.

3.GANDHI'S VIEWS ON JAINISM AND BUDDHISM

Gandhi viewed Jainism and Buddhism very much similar to Hinduism and did not consider them as independent of each other. The influence of Jainism bore the most visible impact on Gandhi. His concepts of non-violence and fasting were mostly in consonance with its traditions. Gandhi had the fortune of being part of his father“s interactions with Jain monks early in his life. The moral and spiritual dimension of the religion strengthened Gandhi“s ideas of non-violence towards all beings. The other ethical virtues related to Jainism such as purity, chastity, celibacy, non-possession, compassion, truth, non-stealing, non-attachment have had a direct impact on Gandhi. Fasting too constitutes an important part of the Jains“ tradition of „Vratas“. They also require abstinence from any physical adornments and temptations to physical desires. Though Gandhi acknowledged these tenets to other religions too, his basic understanding of these concepts may be attributed to his earlier exposition to Jainism. Gandhi was attracted to Buddhism by its „non-recognition of the caste distinctions“. Gandhi was impressed with „the one thing that Buddha showed India was that God was not a God who can be appeased by the sacrifice of the innocent animals“. Those who do so were guilty of double sin, as he viewed it. Gandhi perceived dharma as „God“, who is not distinct from His own law. The law and lawmaker are thus one and the same, the laws being eternal and unalterable just as its maker. Buddha preached and practised Ahimsa in true letter and spirit. Since anger begets anger and hatred begets hate, the source of all evil, it may be countered by Ahimsa through the right conduct as prescribed by Buddha. Buddhism also emphasises self-discipline and moral conduct, through its eight-fold path. The universalistic and humanistic message of Buddhism was deeply imbibed by Gandhi.

4.GANDHI'S VIEWS ON HINDUISM

Gandhi, writes D.M. Datta, believed that every individual is born with definite hereditary tendencies, in a cultural and physical environment and is therefore, capable of development in a particular way. It is futile and unnecessary to ignore the religious heritage with which an individual is born“. In spite of his extensive reading on different religions, his interactions with people from all faiths and his perception of the virtues associated with different religions, Gandhi acknowledged that Hinduism would suit him the best. Though this religion had its own crippling practices and preconceived notions, it is the essential ethical virtues and principles as cited in various texts like the Upanishads, Vedas and The Gita that pacified Gandhi the most. Datta further states that „the presence of God in all beings, the love of all creatures, the ethics of self-discipline, and selfless service, leading to liberation“ appealed to Gandhi. Gandhi considered Hinduism as not an exclusive religion; he opined that „there is room for the worship of all prophets of the world in it. It is not a missionary religion. Hinduism tells everyone to worship God according to faith or dharma, and so lives at peace with all religions“. He was deeply impressed by its assimilative characteristic and its profound stress on the unity of all beings, which is fundamentally moralistic and spiritualistic in essence. The absolute oneness of all beings and omnipresence of God, in animate and inanimate beings as well represents its universalistic nature. Its insistence on Ahimsa towards respect for all living beings, including animals, made a profound impact on Gandhi. At the same time, Gandhi was pained at the discrimination Hinduism allows in the form of caste system and the curse of untouchability. These not only negated its universalistic nature but also remained as severe drawbacks of the religion.

Gandhi was a religious reformer in the context of his utter dislike for untouchability, irrational ideas and superstitions. He felt that these features run contrary to Hinduism“s universalistic appeal and cease to have moral basis. To him, „the task of religion is to guide man in his spiritual and moral development“ (Unto Tahtinen, pp.20-21). Gandhi had his own understanding and interpretation of religion which he consistently subscribed to. Gandhi imbibed the positive features from other religions and combined it with Hinduism. Hinduism speaks of attaining salvation through knowledge, action and devotion and absolves itself of any rigidity and giving way to liberal approach. It is this aspect of Hinduism to which Gandhi subscribed and termed it as accommodating: „Hinduism is a grand evolutionary process and not a narrow creed. Hinduism is a living organism liable to growth and decay and subject to this law of Nature“.

According to him, „to be a Hindu is to believe in God, the immortality of the soul, transmigration, the law of Karma, Moksha etc. and to try to practice truth and ahimsa in daily life“. As against the Western concept of religion, Hinduism rules out indulgence and multiplication of wants as these hamper one’s growth to ultimate identity with the universal self. Gandhi believed in the purity and sanctity of Hinduism. He felt that „it is not buried in its ample scriptures but is a living faith speaking like a mother to her aching child“.

• OTHER RELATED VIEWS OF GANDHIJI

- In this IST place, he considered himself a Hindu. Writing in 1927 in “Young India”. He said, “Hinduism was the most tolerant of all the religions.” Its freedom from dogmas gave the largest scope for self-expression. It enabled the followers not merely to respect all the other religions, but to admire assimilate whatever may be good in other’s faith. Non violence as common to all religions but it has found the highest expression and application in Hinduism. Hinduism believes in oneness. There was no trace of defensiveness in the Proclamation of this faith and along with it went a deep acceptance of the truth of all other religions. He was proud of Hinduism but it did not prevent him from rejecting and criticizing several justifications, ideas and beliefs which Hindu regard as the part of their religion for instance.
- He not only rejected untouchability but fought against it throughout his life. He was opposed to blood sacrifices to deities. Indeed, he opposed every form of cruelty to animals. He also criticised ‘Phuka’ by which Peasants used to drive a nail fixed to a stick into the scutum of bullocks to make them to move faster. He gave up drinking the milk of Cows and Buffaloes. It was only during a serious illness in 1918 that Kasturba persuaded him to drink goat’s milk to save his life. Even he was opposed to this but he continued to drink it for carrying out his work. He rejected the Hindu-Jain concept of kindness which was confined to not killing an animal. He once committed the great Hindu Sin of Cow Killing, by shooting a calf to put an end to its Pain. His concept of kindness to animals was very western and Modern. He had no time for elaborate rituals and Pujas and he never consulted Astrologers. He was a real Karmayogi, He condemned the wide spread practice of Child marriage, dowry and Human Treatment of Widows. In 1918, he stood for gender equality. He declared, “Woman is the companion with equal mental capacities and she has the same right of freedom and equality.” He wanted them to have legal status as equal to men.

- It is a well-known fact the ‘Ruskin’, ‘Tolstoy’ and ‘Thoreau’ and the Bible & Gita all influenced Gandhi. From Tolstoy, he derived his critical attitude to organised religion and from Ruskin, the ideal of a simple life. When he considered an idea good, he tried to put it into practice but even here, however, idealistic the idea in Practising it, Gandhi did not give up his sense of social reality. He saw ‘Praxis’ as the necessary completion of an idea. He read the ‘Bible’ when he was a law student in England, the life of ‘Christ’ and the ‘Sermon’ on the Mount went straight to his heart. The idea of returning done for hatred and good for evil captivated him, though he didn’t comprehend it fully. The Gita also had a great impact on him, In particular, the ideas of ‘aparigraha’ (non-possession) and ‘Samabhava’ equality. He gave up all the legal practices. He also made sure that Kasturba accepted ‘Aparigraha’ along with him, and persuaded him to give up other valuable gold necklace.
- Gandhi regarded the Gita as his “Mother’s Milk” but, Strange as it may seem, He found in it’s, the Support for non-violence. According to Gandhi, the Mahabharata had demonstrated the futility of violence. “Let it be granted” he wrote in 1929 in an introduction to his Gujarati warfare is consistent with the renunciation of fruit and other later on, he realised that the perfect renunciation is impossible out perfect observance of ‘Ahimsa’ in every shape and form. Gandhi discovered non violence not only in the Gita but in the Bible and this Quran. According to Gandhi, in the Quran “non-violence is enjoined as duty, violence and permitted as a necessity His study of the Bible and Koran led him to the Conviction that there was an underlying unity in all relation. Acc. to him, “The time had passed when the followers of one religion could stand and say, ‘Ours is the only True religion and all others are false. Acc. to him, “God, Allah, Rama, Narayan, Ishwar, Khuda, were descriptions of the same being. He rejected the idea of conversion from one religion to another.
- In Gandhi’s view, religious practices, Ideas and beliefs had to be subjected to the test of reason, and those which failed the test rejected. This test he applied to all religions, while Gandhi regarded all established religions as divinely inspired, he also recognised a higher religion which was criminal and which transcended Particular religions. He stated in 1940 than “Religion does not mean sectarianism.

B. R. Nanda, the distinguished biographer of Gandhi, has concluded from his study of Gandhi’s religious ideas and practices that “Gandhi’s concept of religion had little in common with what generally passes for organised religion: dogmas, rituals, superstition and bigotry. Gandhi’s religion was simply an ethical framework for the conduct of daily life. While Gandhi believed in the immanence of God in every human being, there were also occasions when he prayed to what appears an external entity for a gift or benefit.

In a very perceptive observation on Hinduism, the French Anthropologists, Louis Dumont, has stated that Paradoxical as it may seem, in Hinduism, the renounces (Sanyasi) are the creative Innovator. But is true of renouncers from the Buddha and Mahavira to Gandhi but Gandhi stood the entire renouncer tradition on its head. This was symbolized by his refusal to don 'the ochre robe', and instead stick to white 'Khadi' which became the symbol of freedom moil. It was Gandhi, who devised that potent instrument of collective action, 'satyagraha', to enable oppressed, exploited and weak people to fight against rich and powerful oppressors. For Gandhi, the Political, economic and social dimensions are inseparable from Religion. This is point, where he is most definitely not a Modernist.

8.3 SWAMI VIVEKANANDA VIEWS ON RELIGION

Swami 'Vivekananda' born on Jan. 12, 1863, on the festival day of 'Makrasamkranti' his nickname was 'Biley' and in adulthood he received the adult name of 'Narendranath' all to the Hindu custom. His childhood was moulded by his mother's deep traditional sense of Sadhu and Sansayasis his father motivated him towards law study to join the most radical branch of the Brahmo Samaj. The Sadharan Brahmo Samaj' was led by 'Shivananth Shastri' and 'Vijay Krishna Goswami'. Narendra adopted two aspects of Sadharan Brahmo Samaj.

1. The belief that universal religion was practical as entailed service to mankind.
2. The sacredness of all social relationships - even marriage the main concern of Brahmo was to preach 'Universal Theism' not only to educated but also to uneducated masses. This approach would be adopted by the future Vivekananda.

Vivekananda was the disciple of 'Ramakrishna' Pujari of the Datasheeswar Temple outside Calcutta. Narendra in 1881 went to see Ramakrishna at Datasheeswar. There he was invited to sit on Ramakrishna's small bed. Immediately, Ramakrishna put his foot on Narendra's chest. Narendra began to lose sensory awareness of his body. He experienced varying degrees of loss of body consciousness, loss of an ordinary sense of time, loss of or changes in personal identity etc. Thus, Narendra began to alter his stance which he would later identify as the key to his resistance to Ramakrishna. He would worship Kali and finally break the letter of his Brahmo oath all though, the spirit may have been allure / broken years before.

- Search for Universal Foundation

By August, 1889, we convinced that reinterpretation of the Vedas would provide a scriptural base for a socially concerned Vedanta thus reform Vedanta would be free from caste distinction and injustice. According to him the proper question contains itself the answers. Ramakrishna thought that Vedanta was the highest expression of universal religion. It is difficult to determine whether Swami ‘Narendra’ searched for. Support from a traditional Siddha and Yogi etc. In his own words he stated “I am Ramakrishna’s slave, having laid my body at the feet of Tulsi & Tulsi leaves” and his aim is to devote himself to the service of the all-renouncing devotees founded by him. His command was that his all-renouncing devotees should group themselves together. Narendra served that India’s spirituality could be proven by the extraordinary accomplishments of its Gurus, Siddhis, and Sadhus. He saw all Gurus are one and are fragments and Raditions of God, the “Universal Guru”.

NEO - HINDU MISSION

Narendra wants Datta’s life involves three phases “

- The break and his Gurubhais
- The re-establishing of Contact from America to these Saktas of Ramakrishna and
- The return to India and founding the Ramakrishna order.

- VIEWS OF VIVEKANANDA

Swami Vivekananda very well understood the social role of religion. As a matter of fact, the tools that Vivekananda used to uplift the common masses from poverty, ignorance etc. were religion and education. He used religion for spiritual growth and education for material prosperity of the individuals. But he always gave more importance on the spiritual aspect of human being. Vivekananda was mostly influenced by Sankara’s monistic tendency. Sankara emphasized the monistic tendency of Upanishads and develops it into a systematic ‘Advaitavada’. He emphasized the reality of the unconditioned and unqualified (nirguna) Brahman, and regards God (Iswara), the individual souls (Jiva) and the world (Jagat) as appearance due to an indefinable principle called Maya (cosmic nescience). Maya is neither real nor unreal. The central doctrine of Advaita is that Brahman is the only Reality, all else being an illusory appearance. Sankara himself expresses the quintessence of his philosophy in half a verse ‘Brahman Satyam Jagatmithya Jiva brahmaiva na parah.’

The meaning of this verse is that Brahman is the only ultimate reality, the world of multiplicity is false and ultimately the Atman and the Brahman are not different. This is the central theme of religion of Advaita Vedanta. The non-duality of Brahman the non-reality of the world and the non-difference of the soul from Brahman-these three constitute the essential teaching of Advaita. In some texts of Upanishads, Brahman has been defined as Sat, Cit and Ananda-existence, consciousness and bliss. But even the description of Brahman as Sat, Cit, Ananda though more accurate than accidental descriptions, yet it can vary the reality of Brahman. Such description serves only to direct the mind towards Brahman by denying of unreality, unconsciousness and blisslessness. Hence truly speaking an accurate description of Brahman must be negative, that is, by way of saying that ‘It is not this’ not this’, or of dissociating it from all qualities and characters. Brahman is really nirguna.

Sankara, however, admits that Brahman may be described as the cause, the creator, the sustainer, the destroyer of the world and therefore also as an omnipotent and omniscient being from the lower attitude of our practical life. From that standpoint he appears to possess all these qualities. Brahman in this respect is called saguna Brahman or Isvara. Vivekananda accepts Sankara's Advaita Vedanta with little modification. Like Advaita, Vivekananda says that reality is one. This only reality is the Absolute Brahman or infinite Brahman. Vivekananda accepts in Vedantic line that all souls are part of Brahman. "What is meant by part of the infinite? The infinite is indivisible; there cannot be part of the infinite. The absolute cannot be divided. What is meant, therefore, by saying that all these sparks are from Him?" Vivekananda raised such avarices from his part. His resolution is, there is but one Infinite Being in the universe and that Infinite Being appears as many. But the appearance of division is due to delusion, it is not real. Brahman has not been divided, but only appears to be divided. He is one Infinite Being of the universe. All others are not parts, but whole of it.

The essence of religion is derived by Vivekananda from the above Vedantic repercussion. As all being is one with Brahman and hence, each soul is divine. But this divinity remains latent in human and other beings. The goal of religion or essence of religion is to realize this divinity, that is realization of the God in the self and to manifest it. Vivekananda believes that religion is not the outcome of the weakness of human nature. It is never because we fear. Religion is law which is upholding expanding aspect of human potential divinity. Every individual has to realize its divinity. He says that individual beings are like the sparks of Brahman and therefore divinity is potentially inherent in it. This divinity is termed as 'God'. According to him, it is the realization and manifestation of such divinity in the soul, which form the essence of religion. So, he says "Religion is the manifestation of the Divinity already in man."

He practically represents the Vedanta philosophy of India. He realized that religion is the watch-word of Vedanta. There is only one reality pervading through the universe. There is one idea throughout all the Upanishads that is the realization of this One reality. Hence Vivekananda says "Religion is realization, not talk, nor doctrine, nor theories, however beautiful they may be, it is being and becoming, nor hearing or acknowledging. It is the whole soul's becoming, not hearing or acknowledging. It is the whole soul's becoming changed into what it believes.

Vivekananda is interested in the problem of the origin of religion. According to him religion originated in man's bold attempt to go beyond the limitations of nature. Religion originated in fearlessness. He took into consideration two theories of the origin of religion that were given by two different schools of scholars. These two are—the theory of ancestor worship and the theory of nature worship. According to the first one, ancestor worship was the beginning of religion. It was prevalent among the Egyptians, Babylonians, Hindus, and Chinese etc. In ancient times peoples belong to these religions believed that the spirit lived even when the body was dissolved. Again, according to the second school, which mostly depended on ancient literature, emphasized that nature-worship was the beginning of religion. The different forces of nature appeared to the people in the ancient times to be mysterious. These peoples deified and worshiped the forces of nature.

These two theories have been reconciled in Vivekananda's own theory. He claims that in this third view is to be found the true story of origin of religion. According to Vivekananda religion is originated in the struggle to transcend the limitations of nature. Explaining this point he says "Either man goes to seek for the spirits of his ancestors, the spirits of the dead, that is, he wants to get a glimpse of what there is after the body is dissolved, or, he desires to understand the power working behind the stupendous phenomena of nature. Whichever of these is the case, one thing is certain, that he tries to transcend the limitations of the senses. This is the reason behind both ancestor worship and nature worship. Man remains active throughout his life and at one time man dies. The primitive peoples could not give any explanation for this phenomenon. It is because his senses could not apprehend the realm beyond death. Man wanted to get a glimpse of what remained there after the body is dissolved. Ancestor-worship was the expression of that wish. Similarly, nature-worship was an attempt to understand the working behind the forces of nature. At the ancient times, man could not apprehend the forces of nature though their senses. From this it is clear that in both the cases an attempt has been made to go beyond the realm of the senses.

Swami Vivekananda takes the specific examples of dreams so far as the first glimpse of religion is concerned. According to him "It is very natural that the first glimpse of religion should have come through dreams." In ancient days, it appeared as quite natural to the enquiring mind that if mind could go on working even in the state of dream when the body was apparently dead, there is no wrong in supposing that it can go on working even when the body is actually dissolved. According to Vivekananda, that might have suggested to man the idea of soul as well as its immortality. Thus, we find that all the explanations of the origin of religion, like fetishism, animism, natureism etc., somehow presuppose the basic fact that religion originates in man's attempt to go beyond the limitations of the senses. Man, in primitive times experienced uneasiness within when certain phenomena appeared to him as beyond his capacity of senses. Man's religious activities were expressions of that feeling of uneasiness. Primitive man used to live like any other animals. His activities were confined to such activities only that could satisfy his basic instincts. But, when unlike other animals, he started to go beyond the sensuous existence, religion was born. This view appears to Swami Vivekananda as the most comprehensive and hence the most satisfactory explanation of the origin of religion.

According to Vivekananda religion is that search of human heart which brings the light of eternal to the finite creature. Man is conscious about his limited existence and he is always dissatisfied with his limitations. Therefore, man wants to get something higher and mightier than him. Religion is the expedition which expands human self and knots finite self with infinite eternal one. It is the search of human destiny, realization of man's basic divine nature, through the search of God. He writes "Man has wanted to look beyond, wanted to expand himself, and that we call progress, evolution, has been always measured by that one search, the search for human destiny, the search for God." Amidst our various daily struggles to meet our needs, though we are too much immersed in our ambition, a moment comes in our life when our mind wants to get out of our day-to-day work. Our mind wants to sour higher and higher to go beyond itself to catch some glimpses of the eternal light. Religion is an attempt to transcend this limit of phenomenal world.

In Vivekananda's view religion is the attempt to experience perfect freedom from the part of human self. He distinguishes between the living and the dead thus "How can we make the distinction between the living and the dead? In the living there is freedom, there is intelligence, in the dead all is bound and no freedom is possible, because there is no intelligence." With the help of following example he explains this point. "A huge locomotive has rushed on over the line and a small worm that was creeping upon one of the rails saved its life by crawling out of the path of the locomotive. Yet this little worm, so insignificant that it can be crushed in a moment, is a living something, while this locomotive, so huge, so immense, is only an engine, a machine. You say the one has life and the other is only dead matter and all its powers and strength and speed of the locomotive are only those of a dead machine, a mechanical contrivance. Yet poor little worm which moved upon the rail and which the least touch of the engine would have deprived of its life is a majestic being compared to that huge locomotive. It is a small part of the Infinite and, therefore, it is greater than this powerful engine." A small worm is a majestic being compared to a huge powerful engine which may be thousand-fold larger than the worm. It is because the worm has more freedom than the engine. In living creature there is freedom, there is intelligence. This freedom distinguishes us from mere machine. Because the machine has no intelligence. We are part of Infinite Ocean of consciousness, intelligence and freedom.

In the above example Vivekananda shows us the point that as human being who has the intelligence, struggles for more freedom than he has already possessed. With the help of his intelligence human being realizes that he is a limited creature with limited freedom, and absolute freedom is yet to be realized. According to Vivekananda, the effort from mankind to realize absolute freedom is religion. Religion is an attempt to be free and hence religion and freedom both go hand in hand. Both religion and freedom are related terms. Here another significant point to be noted that intelligence is one kind of postulate of religion. In other words, to be religious, intelligence is prerequisite. It is because intelligence makes us conscious about our limitation. As a result, among all the living creature's human being has its religion for attaining more freedom. It is not known that other living beings have religion except man.

Human intelligence starts a ceaseless inquiry from the down of its consciousness, about the meaning and mystery of life. A universal dissatisfaction is always associated with man. We struggle hard to attach to some goal and then discover that we do not want that. Vivekananda writes "It is because freedom is every man's goal. He seeks it ever. His whole life is a struggle after it. The child rebels against law as soon as it is born. Its first utterance is a cry, a protest against the bondage in which it finds itself. This longing for freedom produces the idea of a Being who is absolutely free. The concept of God is a fundamental element in the human constitution." Thus there is always an unconscious struggle of the human with the spiritual, of the lower with the higher mind. And this struggle is to break bondage and to be free.

Vivekananda for the justification of any issue took his stand on the nondualistic Vedanta philosophy of Sankara. He explained Vedanta on his own way in accordance with the knowledge he had received from Ramakrishna. According to Vedanta all is Brahman. Brahman is the source of freedom and every moment men assert freedom. Individual attains freedom only when all the distinction of 'I' and 'not I' disappears, or when individual is one with Brahman. This is called self-realization or God-realization. Thus, according to Vivekananda, the search which begins to shatter the limitation to attain perfection ends, when the individual identifies itself with the absolutely free being which is called 'Brahman' in Vedanta philosophy. This identification is the end or ultimate goal of religion.

Vivekananda opines that all men are marching towards freedom. Man cannot give up the idea of freedom without man's being is lost. And religion paves the ground for freedom. This freedom means freedom in its totality-physical, mental, spiritual. This freedom is the watchword of the Upanishads. He says, "Freedom is the watchword, be free, a free body, a free mind and a free soul. That is what I have felt in my life. I will rather be doing evil freely, than be doing good under bondage." So we can say that in Vivekananda's philosophy, freedom is the key-note of religion. Religion is the cultivation of freedom.

The concept of freedom carries with it a perfectly free being, because where there is absolute freedom there must be an absolutely free being. And this absolutely free being is called God. According to Vivekananda, the whole of nature is worship of God. Wherever there is life there is this search for freedom and that freedom is the same as God. Necessarily this freedom gives us mastery over all nature, but this freedom is impossible without knowledge. The more we are knowing the more we are becoming master of nature. So, he says "Mastery alone is making us strong and if there be some being entirely free and master of nature, that being must have a perfect knowledge of nature, must be omnipresent and omniscient. Freedom must go hand in hand with these, and that being alone who has acquired these will be beyond nature."

The conception of religion of Vivekananda is linked with Vedantic principle of feeling oneness of the universe. He emphasizes that the knowledge which brings the feeling of oneness towards mankind leads to the fruit of religion, that is freedom. Further he says "In what sense you are pure? The God in you is God in all. If you have not known this you have known nothing. How can there be difference? It is all one. Every being is the temple of the highest; if you can see that, good, if not spirituality has yet to come to you." He again says "See God in every person-working through every all hands, walking through all feet, and eating through every mouth. In every being He lives; through all minds He thinks. He is self-evident, nearer unto us than ourselves. To know this is religion, is faith, and may it please the Lord to give us this faith! When we shall feel that oneness, we shall be immortal."

From the above it has been seen that Vivekananda's conception of religion is necessarily based on transcendental oneness of all creatures. His religion is based on equality, which is key-note of Vedanta. This equality leads him to potential divinity of all souls as part or reflection of the same ultimate reality which is 'Brahman'. So, in Vivekananda's philosophy there is no difference among us, there is no difference between men and women, between high and the low. We all are the manifestation of the same reality. The same Brahman resides in every one.

Philosophy of Religion always deals with the concept of existence of God. Vivekananda asked us to see God in everyone. In his philosophy God is identified 'self'. He told that, God is within our own self. That is propelling us to seek for him, to realize him. That is his concept of God. To him God exists, but he is not the man sitting upon a cloud. But if we approach to our real self, we can see the Him within us. He is pure spirit. He is our self. God is the body, God is the mind, the soul and everything in this world. He is something still higher than known, unknown, and unknowable. If it can be known, He will be no longer God. God can only be known in and through man. We are ordinary mortals and God can be seen in man alone as a form. Vivekananda's in this regard suggested us to play our part in the universe as an actor on the stage. He asked the people to see each and every man in the world as God. His identification of God is in everything, in every work, every thought, in every feeling. Such realization of divinity in humanity leaves no room for arrogance.

Since God is identical with self, so Vivekananda views that it is in love that religion consists and not in ceremonies. To put him "It is in love that religion exists and not in ceremony, in the pure and sincere love in the heart." It is love which makes us able to see God in others. Love is worship. As he says: "He who sees Shiva in the poor, in the weak, and in the diseased, really worships Shiva...He who has served and helped one poor man seeing Shiva in him, without thinking of his caste, or creed, or race, or anything, with him Shiva is more pleased than with the man who sees Him only in temples." Thus, according to Vivekananda, he who has served and helped one poor man seeing Shiva in him, without thinking of his caste, creed, race on anything, with him Shiva is more pleased than with the man who sees him only in temples. This can be explained with the help of the following example. A rich man has a garden with two gardeners one of them works hard and produces plentiful crops from it, while the other idles away his time, singing the praises of the master. Certainly, the master will be placed with the first only. Shiva is the master and the whole world in his garden. He will be pleased only with those who take care of his children among whom are included all that are weak and poor, all animals and all his creation. He who wants to serve the father must serve his children first. So, a devotee of his must serve all his creatures in the world first. From these remarks it follows that Vivekananda's love is not a mere wishful thinking or feeling. A person who is motivated or guided by love tries his/ her best to do something positive which will alleviate the suffering of others. Love unites us with others. This is true of all other moral virtues. To him unless a man is pure in body and mind, his coming into a temple or any other religious places to worship God is useless. External worship is only a symbol of internal worship. But for internal worship purity of the heart is essential.

Vivekananda has laid down also what religion is not. For him religion is not dogmas, doctrines, rites, rituals and other externals. But he did not outright reject these. In his view these externals are helpful at the kindergarten stage of religion. But man must soon cross this kindergarten stage and come to the higher stage where he realizes- ‘spirit as spirit’. Thus, Vivekananda’s view of religion is not theological. His concept of religion is purely spiritual. Religion in this dynamic sense forms the foundation of Vivekananda’s social philosophy.

Religion is not also priestcraft. Vivekananda points out “Priestcraft is in its nature cruel and heartless. That is why religion goes down where priestcraft arises.” In fact, according to Vivekananda, priestcraft is the absence of religion, it is an irreligious phenomenon. It is based on a claim of privileges on the ground of superiority attained in the spiritual field. Vivekananda points out that this claim of superiority is not tenable in terms of Vedanta. “As to spirituality”, says Vivekananda, “no privilege should be claimed there. All beings, great or small, are equally manifestations of God; the difference is only in the manifestation. The most ignorant man, the most ignorant child, is as great a messenger of God as any that ever existed, and as great as any that are yet to come. Wherever there is a being, that being contains the infinite message of the Highest.” Vivekananda declares, “The work of Advaita [Vedanta], therefore, is to break down all these privileges.”

It is clear from this statement that priestcraft is a privilege-making force. But religion is a privilege-breaking force. In the history of religion, none before Vivekananda did lay down this dichotomy, and show this difference, between religion and priestcraft. Karl Marx and some other critics have made a mess of priestcraft and religion, and held religion responsible for all the vices of priestcraft. Raising his voice in protest against such critic Vivekananda says “for all the devilry that religion is blamed with, religion is not at all in fault: no religion ever persecuted men, no religion ever burnt witches... What then incited people to do these things? Politics, but never religion.” Politics certainly has to be blamed for all the atrocities that have been perpetrated in history in the name of religion and they have always been instigated by the priests.

In Vivekananda’s view theological doctrines also are not the essence of religion. Vivekananda challenged all the theological doctrines such as the Christian doctrine of original sin, salvation, of rewards in heaven and punishment in hell and such other doctrines. ‘Ye! Divinities on earth! Sinners! It is a sin to call a man so; it is a standing libel on human nature’, he declared in one of his immortal speeches at the Chicago Parliament of Religions in 1893. Quoting the first five words of the speech ‘Ye! Divinities on earth! -sinners?’ Professor Binoy Kumar Sarkar, observes that these five-word formula was like a bomb-shell shocked all the peoples in the Parliament of Religions. Sarkar says ‘The first four words summoned into being the gospel of joy, hope, virility, energy and freedom for the races of men. And yet with the last word, embodying as it did a sarcastic question, he demolished the whole structure of souldegenerating, cowardice-promoting, negative, pessimistic thoughts. On the astonished world the little five-word formula fell like a bomb-shell. The first four words he brought from the East and the last word he brought from the West."

Again, to Vivekananda, religion was not mere this or that creed. To put Vivekananda "I make the distinction between religion and creed. Creed is something antagonistic and combative. Religion is of the Self-which is in every religion." Therefore, he criticizes those who take only an intellectual interest in religion. "Religion is with these people", he observed, "a sort of intellectual opium-eating, and there it ends." It is interesting to note that like Karl Marx, Vivekananda also thought that at times religion may turn out to be the opium of the people. But that happens, when religion is only lifeless intellectualism. When it is practical, living, then it is different.

According to Vivekananda Symbology, History, Philosophy and Mysticism are the fundamentals of religions of the world. He says all the religions of the world past or present, embrace one or more of these principles. But highly developed religions embrace all these four principles. Symbology means the employment of various aids to preserve and develop the religious faculty of man. The philosophy of each religion as illustrated in the lives of divine or human teachers acknowledged by each religion. This includes mythology. For what is mythology to one race or period, is or was history to other races or periods. Again, he says philosophy is the rationale of the whole scope of each religion. Mysticism is the assertion of something superior to sense knowledge and reason.

So far as his concept of religion is concerned, Vivekananda believed in the equal validity of all religions. Vivekananda was always against the hope for exclusive survival of one religion and destruction of others. Some believe in pluralism from the conviction that pluralism provides a wider range of alternatives, a greater freedom of choice and consequently greater opportunities of self-expression and self-realization. Some believe in it as a convenient and respectable method for maintaining social harmony and communal peace in a multi-religious society like India. Whether one learns to accept the validity of religions out of faith and conviction, or whether one learns to treat other's religion with tolerance out of an understanding of the historical bonds between the community and that religion, the present and the future of human society has hardly any other option. The unique contribution of Swami Vivekananda lies in the formulation of unity when he said that... 'Each must assimilate the spirit of the others and yet preserve his individuality and grow according to his own law of growth.' According to Vivekananda Religious quarrels are always over the husks. When purity goes away from our religion and when spirituality goes away from our soul we begin to quarrel with the followers of other religions, even sometimes with the followers of the same religion. None should try to convert others into his/her own religion. The Christian is not to become a Hindu or a Buddhist, nor a Hindu or a Buddhist to become a Christian. But each religion must assimilate the spirit of the others and yet preserve the individuality and grow according to his own law of growth. Here we get the idea of religious acceptance. Vivekananda emphasized on acceptance not on toleration. He says that the so-called toleration is often blasphemy.

Every religion has its founder, preacher etc. If we study the lives of the founders or preachers of different religions, we will understand that every one of them was destined to play a part only. Their propagated ideals are not universally accepted. But some are accepted. We can refer here to an example. Contribution is an essential part of Islam which is accepted by everyone without discrimination of religion. Vivekananda says that harmony consists in the sum total of different universal ideals of different religions propagated by different preachers. But harmony in no way consists in one note. It appears that the future Swami Vivekananda could not lead his Guru Bhais from their Bhakti to its worship of Kali and Ramakrishna. Ramakrishna had sought that Bhakti was the best form of religion of the ‘Kaliyuga’ and his former Gurubhais were not willing to follow Sachchitananda’s call to social reform on May 21,1893, the newly named ‘Swami Vivekananda’ received his name from a suggestion of the Maharaja of ‘Khetri’. Maharaja conceived a plan to earn enough money to continue his mission in India. His work in America, England and Madras was commenced before he was able to bring his former Gurubhai to his spiritual conceptions. In his 1st letter to former Gurubhai, he told of his plan to raise up the masses in India, working in America to get money, giving spirituality in return, depending on no one in Hindustan he called upon his former Gurubhai’s to renounce their personal goal of Mukti. “It is only by doing good to others that one attains to once own good and it is by leading other to Bhakti and Mukti that one attains them once self.” He gradually drew some relief work, goaling them into practical service.

The return of Swami Vivekananda to India has been exploited extensively but what must be noted is the gradual crisis which beset Vivekananda upon his return. Vivekananda’s Vedantas was conceived not as the true religion but as the eternal truth behind all religions.

Thus, true knowledge or truth is oneness, unity. The test of truth is oneness the principal of which truth is judged, which Swami Vivekananda has designated “reason” is unity is the goal of religion and science. Unity or absolute truth is God alone. Truth is to be judged by truth and by nothing else” Swami’s quest for meaning has as its goal nothing less than absolute truth for him the scriptures had firstly been accepted “On faith” in order that they might be used to prove the existence of the Absolute. Swami Vivekananda found that the foundation of every level of knowledge is personal experience. True knowledge will never accept “On Faith” in an outside authority. If it is universally true it must be capable of verification by each seeker after truth when he has reached that level of understanding according to Swami Vivekananda all apprehensions of truth depend upon each higher synthesis.

Swami Vivekananda identifies the changeless, infinite, eternal unity as the most meaningful concern of life. The unique aspect of Swami’s teaching about the Cosmos is not that the cosmos lacks ultimate reality but his two theories of causation and their corollary views of the universe. He combined ‘Parinama’ from ‘Samkhya’ to ‘Vivarta’ from ‘Advaita’ and made them refer to two complementary but distinct realms of reality. Accordingly, ‘Parinama’ referred to a real transformation of the cause into a multiplicity of effects according to ‘Vivarta’ the relative view is transcended and the apparent multiplicity of objects can no longer be found. For beyond the bonds of time, space and causation there is only Brahman.

8.4 B. R. AMBEDKAR VIEWS ON RELIGION

“Bhimrao Ramji Ambedkar” who later on came to known as ‘BabaSaheb’ was born on 1891 into the untouchable ‘Mahar’ caste in ‘Maharashtra’ He is regarded as the architect of Indian Constitution and played a Major role in the formation of Modern India. Just two mouths before his death (1956) he underwent public initiation into Buddhism large number of followers. He was very much influenced by the Buddhist ideology because, for him, Buddhism rests on

- a) The contention that Buddhism is based on ‘reason’, ‘experience’ and ‘Silence’
- b) Its contestation of divinity and
- c) It recognizes the fundamental principles of social life.

According to Ambedkar, Hinduism was a religion which implied hierarchy whereas other religions authorise equality. In his ‘Round Table Conference’ in 1933, he intended to leave the Hindu fold and inclined to option for Buddhism. He argued the aim of our mout:

“Is to achieve freedom; Social economic and religious, for untouchables and this freedom cannot be achieved without conversion”.

Dr. B.R. Ambedkar saw religion's role as providing a moral compass and fostering social unity but critiqued its existing forms for their failure to uphold liberty, equality, and fraternity, particularly in Hinduism due to its rigid caste system. He ultimately converted to Buddhism with hundreds of thousands of followers in 1956, believing it to be the most rational and egalitarian religion, aligning with his vision for a just and free society.

- Ambedkar's Criteria for a Just Religion

Ambedkar believed that for a religion to be valid and beneficial to society, it must possess the following characteristics:

- Morality and Reason: It must promote a moral code in harmony with reason and science.
- Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity: Its fundamental tenets must recognize and foster the principles of liberty, equality, and fraternity.
- Rejection of Poverty: It should not sanctify or ennable poverty.
- Dignity and Human Rights: It must provide equal status, opportunity, and treatment for all its followers, especially the marginalized.

Critique of Hinduism

- Caste System: Ambedkar identified Hinduism as a religion that upheld and sanctified the caste hierarchy, leading to inherent inequality and deprivation of human rights for many.
- Lack of Freedom: He found that Hinduism, in its traditional form, deprived moral life of freedom by emphasizing conformity to unjust commands and laws that were not applied equally to all classes.

Embrace of Buddhism

- ⊕ Equality and Rationality: Ambedkar chose Buddhism because it propagated equality, its teachings were based on rationality and consciousness, and it did not claim divinity or supernatural powers.
- ⊕ Moral and Ethical Foundation: He believed Buddhism's emphasis on morality and an ethical framework was a superior foundation for society compared to the ritualistic nature of Hinduism.
- ⊕ Social and Spiritual Unity: Ambedkar saw Buddhism as the most suitable religion for building a democratic society, providing the basis for a sacred morality and a sense of responsibility to bind social groups together.

Ambedkar's Legacy in Religion

His religious views were intrinsically linked to his fight for social justice, liberty, and equality for the untouchables. His decision to convert to Buddhism was not a rejection of religion itself, but a redefinition of a more just, equitable, and humane form of it, aimed at emancipating marginalized communities. He devoted the last decade of his life to developing a Buddhist philosophy that could empower these communities and create a more free and equitable society

⊕ OTHER RELATED VIEWS OF AMBEDKAR

B.R. Ambedkar viewed religion as a fundamental social doctrine, necessary for establishing human morality and a just society, but contended that religions must uphold liberty, equality, and justice to be valid. He saw Hinduism as a religion of inequality and oppression due to its caste system, leading him to embrace Buddhism as the only rational and suitable religion, with its emphasis on prajna (understanding), karuna (love), and samata (equality). Ambedkar criticized religions that sanctified poverty, perpetuated hierarchy, or relied on dogma, emphasizing a rational, ethical, and liberating approach to faith.

1. Religion as a Social Doctrine

Foundation for Society: Ambedkar believed religion was essential for shaping a moral society, acting as a "social doctrine" for establishing righteous relations between people.

Vehicle for Justice or Oppression: While acknowledging religion's power, he argued it could be either a positive force for justice and equality or a tool for oppression and hierarchy.

2.Criticism of Hinduism

Sanctification of Inequality: Ambedkar's primary critique of Hinduism was its sanctification of the caste system and untouchability through its doctrines. Commands and Prohibitions: He viewed Hinduism as a collection of unjust commands and prohibitions, which suppressed freedom and perpetuated inequality between different social classes.

3.The Turn to Buddhism

Rationality and Equality: Ambedkar found Buddhism to be the most rational religion, rejecting concepts of a soul and God in favor of humanistic principles. Emphasis on Morality and Human Well-being: He championed Buddhism for its teachings on prajna (wisdom), karuna (compassion), and samata (equality), which he saw as vital for a good and happy life.

4.A Religion of Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity

Ambedkar believed that true religion must support liberty, equality, and fraternity, values that Buddhism, as he interpreted it, embodied, making it a suitable alternative to Hinduism.

5.Core Principles for a Just Religion

Uphold Liberty, Equality, and Justice: A religion must be a catalyst for these values, not a means to uphold entrenched power structures or hierarchy. Empowerment, Not Subservience: True religion should empower individuals, not dissolve them into a society or make a virtue out of poverty.

- CONCEPT OF BUDDHA'S RELIGION:

Ambedkar states, Buddhism religion is not a reveration, Buddhism denies the existence / reality of God, understood as creator or as absolute, culminate entity. It's certain that Buddha did not claim a divine status for himself nor for his world. The Buddha in his understanding was not Prophet. He argued: The Buddha was a 'margadata'. Buddhism on the contrary is 'discovery'; is the result of inquiry investigation into the conditions of human life on earth'. He claims, Buddhism was nothing if not rational, if not logical. His followers are free to modify or even to abandon any of his teachings, if those teachings did not satisfy these circumstances. Buddhism thus helps to realize the fundamental values.

• MAHATMA GANDHI JI

“Mahatma Gandhi Ji” was against the mass conversion of untouchables and provides two key arguments:

- a) He asserted that untouchability had begun to wither (weaker and disappear) away because of the activities of reformers who would be demoralised by such conversion.
- b) Religion being a spiritual matter, one could not change it as one moves a house.

But Ambedkar was indifferent to the spiritual dimensions of Hinduism which shows that he does not have any faith in God or in Religion. He is thinking of changing from one religion to another just for achieving equality.

• CHOICE OF BUDDHISM AS EGALITARIAN CREED

Ambedkar converted to Buddhism in 1956, exactly 20 years after he had opted in favour of Sikhism. Ambedkar and his followers adopted some theoretical approaches before converting to Buddhism such as:-

- Before adopting another religion if is necessary to Wipe out the Culture of the Hinduism
- His Young followers stopped doing Puja, boycotted Hindu Festivals and broke Idols.
- Infact, they left-those fellows who took part in Hindu Culture. His familiarity to Buddhism went back to his youth in 1908, when his
- Teacher, impressed by his attitude, gave him a biography of 'Lord Buddha'. He had a profound influence on his young mind. In 1934, he built a house called 'Rajgriha', the name of the capital of the ancient Buddhist kings of Bihar.

In 1948, he published Untouchables, a work, which presented untouchables, as the descendants of Buddhists who had been organised when the rest of the society crossed over to Hinduism. At the same time, his activities in the assembly prepared the ground for his conversion to Buddhism. His interest in Buddhism is quite consistent. On the one hand, he published / believed in the need for religion on the past of man and society, but on the other hand, he adhered to the values of Enlightenment: Thus Buddhism, was an ideal choice because it was more susceptible to re-interpretation and adaptation to the modern world than other religions.

According to Ambedkar, 'DHAMMA' was a secular ideology, for understanding the world, man & society, and transforming them in the Light of reason and on the basis of morality. In 1956, Ambedkar wrote to the General Secretary of 'Maha Bodhi Society' that he was preparing the commission of India's untouchables to Buddhism.

- A first wave of Commission occurred on March 18th Agra, where the 'Jatavas' formed the main untouchable caste: on that occasion 2,000 of them renounced Hinduism.
- On May 24, 1956, he announced that he would convert to Buddhism in October 1956 and called upon all untouchables to join him in doing likewise.
- On Sept. 23, he confirmed that the ceremony would take place on Oct. 14, the day of the Hindu festival of Dussehra. He invited the head of the Buddhist monks of India to carry out rituals.

- The Commission took place at Nagpur where several hundred thousand untouchables, came dressed in white, some of them bearing the colours of Flag of Buddhism.
- Ambedkar and his second wife were the first to convert in front of crowd. So, it's Dhamma around which the whole debate revolves. Buddha's main concern was to give salvation to man in his life on earth and not to promise it to him in heaven after he is dead. While Dharma does refer to the control of the end over him or himself. For him Dharma is social and thus helps the people get rid of all kinds of sufferings in this world. Dharma is rightousness, which means right relation between man and man in all spheres of life. According to him, if a man is alone then there is no need of Dharma, but when there are two men living in relation to each other they must find a place for Dharma whether, they like it or not. In other words, society cannot do without Dharma. So, when there is no Dharma, no Buddhism, then there is no society, no society at least that allows coexistance. Dharma is seen as a moral code for both the worlds conduct of life and social interaction and as a constitutional necessity for society. "Morality in Dharma arises from the direct neccessity for man to love man." Ambedkar also emphasizes the law like 'KAMMA' where every person is ethically free to act. There is good (Kusala) as well as bad (Akusala) Kamma. Bad Kamma, leads to a 'bad' moral order, even men may double to give up dhamma altogether. Society may choose not to have any Dharma whereas Good Kamma leads to a good moral order.

Amedkar opted for Buddhism because of its equalitarian Philosophy but also it was a compromise solution which speared him to break Hinduism. His Buddhism became integrated, almost in the form of a sect, as a solution to untouchability, Ambedkar therefore, appeared as a Sect Guru more over after his death, he was to be worshiped as a 'Bodhisattva' an embodiment of Lord Buddha, as much in Maharashtra. Most of the people who have converted, worship only Amedkar and the Buddha and celebrate only their two Birthday as Religious Holidays.

8.5 LET US SUM UP

In the light of above discussion, it can be argued that in Ambedkar's views, Buddhism is the only religion which the world can have. Only the Buddhist Dhamma as an ethics of social action, can bring morality back into society and thus bridging the gap between different or opposite spheres of life. Only Buddhism is able to remould society and to give society a new way of life. Thus, Dhamma takes the place of religion but at the same time surpasses the religion.

9.0 Objectives

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with:

- Hinduism as religion.
- Islam as religion.

9.1 Introduction

India is a plural society. It has several ethnicities; several religions; and several languages and dialects. K.S. Singh has directed a national project on the People of India. He has studied 4635 communities inhabiting our country. He reports that the majority of Indian population follows six major religions, namely, Hinduism, Islam, Christianity, Sikhism, Buddhism and Jainism and a few follows traditional tribal religions or other faiths. If we follow K.S. Singh we would find that a large number of people follow Hinduism. His findings on religion are given as under:

- People who follow one religion

K.S. Singh is divided religion in two parts: The first deals with those communities which follow only one religion. Of them the Hindus form 76.4 per cent, Muslims 12.6 percent, Christians 7.3 per cent, tribal religionists 8.3 per cent, Jains 2.2 per cent, Buddhists 2.0 per cent, Sikhs 2.8 percent, Jew 0.2 per cent and the Zoroastrians 0.19 per cent. Many local forms of religion have been identified like Donyi Polo, Sarna Munda), Sanamahi (Meitei), Gondi Dharma, etc. Secondly, as communities have been treated as a secular category, the followers of different religions have been identified within its ambit. Thus, there are 87 communities who follow both Hinduism and Sikhism, 116 both Hinduism and Christianity, 35 Hinduism and Islam, 21 Hinduism and Jainism and 29 communities who are both Hindu and Buddhist. There are 94 communities who follow Christianity and tribal religions. Buddhists and followers of tribal religion exist in 11 communities. There are 16 communities which are followers of three religions; 11 communities have sections of Hindu, Muslim and Sikh while 6 have Hindu, Muslim and Christians.

Various levels and forms of Hinduism have been identified. Near about 61.2 per cent of the Hindu communities worship a family deity and 31.6 per cent worship a clan deity. Those worshipping village and regional deities are 66.7 per cent each and those who equally worship deities of the wider pantheon are 68.4 per cent. This shows the integrating trends in all forms of Hinduism. Individual and family affiliation to pirs is reported from 493 and 428 communities respectively. For the performance of life-cycle rituals, worship and so on, as many as 51.6 per cent of the communities reportedly employ sacred specialists from within and 69.58 per cent from without their communities. Traditional forms of shamanism are very much alive with almost 20 per cent of the community's seeking protection from evil spirits and the curing of diseases through the medium of shamans.

The Adis in Arunachal Pradesh have revived and even institutionalized their religion of the Sun and the Moon called Donyi Polo. Legend, has it hated there were two suns in the beginning of creation which beat down harshly on the people. An enterprising archer shot down one of them. The other did not rise in protest. He was later persuaded to only after the other also rose in the sky, pale and weak. The concept of two suns is quite old among the Himalayan communities and among some tribal communities like the Munda. The Burzhom site in Kashmir valley (dating back to about 2500 B.C.) has a find showing the two suns. The new religion has inspired significant efforts in the field of education and medical care. The second important tribal religion which has been revived and institutionalized relates to the sacred grove called Sarna or Jahera among the Munda and Santal tribes. It has become the symbol of the solidarity of the tribes who were not converted to Christianity. In the 1961 Census the followers of Sarana Dharma, located mainly in Bihar numbered 4.21 lakhs. A third example has been offered by the Sanamahi cult among the Meitei in Manipur which centers on the traditional faith, employs the Meitei language and non-Brahman priests. The god Sanamahi created animals, plants and man. He created the Meitei. Therefore, the Sanamahi cult is considered intrinsic to the preservation and development of Meitei identity by some scholars.

Our data on change of religion suggests that people in 383 communities or their segments have entered the fold of Hinduism in recent years, while those in 267 have embraced Christianity. People in as many as 112 communities have converted to Islam, and those in 63 have become Sikhs. That those in 159 communities have embraced other than the listed religions, testifies to the popularity of the indigenous systems of faith. Change of region has thus been reported in case of 15 per cent of the communities. They relate mostly to the ST and SC sections of these populations have converted to Christianity in large numbers followed by Sikhism, Islam and Buddhism.

It was difficult to identify the structures and processes that survive conversion. The informants were keen to establish that they were good followers of their new faith and therefore were reluctant to respond. However, it appears that among the elements that survive, the most important are clan exogamy, language, food habits, sartorial practices and economic occupation. There is, of course, sometimes, change in occupation, a measure of affluence with more income coming in and a higher social status. The pre-conversion practices survive among 16.2 per cent of the Christian communities while it is 10.8 per cent among the Buddhist, and 8.5 per cent among the Sikhs, and only 2.9 per cent among the Muslims.

The ASI has been conducting studies on the festivals of India. It is difficult to categorize festivals. Generally, a festival is a mix of many dimensions, social, economic, religious and soon. The largest number of festivals is socio-religious in nature, which is understandable, given the nature of our society and the influence of religion on our communities. Next are the festivals of socio-economic significance, which center around harvesting of crops when communities celebrate the arrival of fresh crops, and gods and spirits are thanked. In recent years festivals have been organized to celebrate the founding of a state or the role of freedom fighters and social reformers. This is also true of the great Festivals of India, which have at one level a pan-Indian spread, and at another level a local meaning and perception.

Traits, rituals, roles and institutions reflect many levels of perception, local, regional, pan-Indian and so on. For instance, marriage rituals which come under the category lokachar or deshachar are shared by communities including Hindus and Muslims in such states as Bihar. A closer examination of the corpus of rituals shows that they are a mix of many elements which include some forms of bride price, notion of equality, even of superiority, of women (though notional), various forms of socialization, exchange of gifts which goes beyond the notion of Kanyadan and so on. The second example concerns folk rituals. The worship of Kali in Bengal reflects perceptions of various communities with differential modes of propitiation and different levels of participation. In fact, such religious practices present a combination of elements drawn from the scriptures or sacred texts and the body of local beliefs and practices.

Movements have been reported from 13 per cent of the communities. They seek to promote social reform by abolishing practices, which are seen as hindering progress and equality, demand facilities for education and a share in the benefits that accrue from the all-round development process. In tribal areas the movements are also ethnic in nature, seeking to promote the interests of the tribal people in terms of control over their resources and their rights. There is also a streak of revivalism in such movements.

An important aspect of the findings relates to the dominance of oral and folk traditions, with an overwhelming number of communities reporting not only survival but also, continuation of such traditions. Folklore, folk song and folk dance continue to be the major forms of expressions of folk consciousness. The classical tradition is less widespread. Western music has been vigorously adopted by some communities, particularly in Mizoram. It is only the tribals who continue with the tradition of men and women dancing together.

In the preceding pages of lesson, we have provided a general characterization of all the religions founding India. In this lesson particularly we discuss Hinduism and Islam.

9.2 HINDUISM

The beginnings of religious diversity in India go back to the country's proto- historic past. There is ample material evidence of the existence of elaborate religious activity in the urban centers associated with the Indus Valley or Harappan civilization five thousand years ago spread over vast areas in north-western, northern, and western parts of the Indo-Pakistan subcontinent. It is reasonable to infer that religious beliefs and rituals of a somewhat different kind must have been present in the rural hinterlands. The city cultures, it is generally believed were overridden by nomadic Aryan-speaking peoples of central Asian origin, around 1500 B.C. They brought in their own religious beliefs and practices, and these focused on the creative and destructive powers of nature. According to this generally accepted view, the Aryans owed little in their religious life to the presumably Dravidian-speaking people they drove out of their homelands.

Scholars who do not accept the general view, but consider the Harappan culture as an unfolding rather than a major break whether wholly internal or aided by a limited migration, maintain that the old and the new cultures coexisted, and that the latter absorbed elements both religious and linguistic from the former (see Parpola, 1994). Vedic religion and Sanskrit took several centuries to acquire the forms in which they have been handed down to us.

The resultant religion was characterized by internal diversities reflecting social, theological and scholastic divisions. Scholars have written about a state religion, centers in temples comprising ritual bathing (there is a great bath in the citadel of Mohenjo- Dharo), worship of gods and goddesses, and perhaps animal sacrifice. Apart from the public (state) and private (domestic) rituals, differences reflecting clan-based cleavages also seem to have existed (see Possehl 1982). The major source of our knowledge about the religious life of the Aryans, besides the numerous archaeological sites, is the body of sacred literature called the Veda (knowledge, wisdom), which is believed to be ever existent (sanatana) and therefore lacking any human author (apaurusheya) and stretches over almost a thousand years.

The earliest of the Vedic texts is the Rig, which has been dated no later than 1200 BC (but is perhaps much older). Its ten books of hymns in praise of divinities presumably represent ten family traditions among the Brahmins (rituals specialists) and took several centuries to compose. The Sama and Yajur Veda extend the scope of the Rig into music and ritual respectively. Finally, the Artharva Veda is believed to represent the absorption of folk religions into the Vedic corpus, resulting in significant changes in it. These religions were encountered by the Aryans as they moved east into the Gangetic valley and adopted more settled ways. Indeed, the valley came to be called the home of the Aryas, Aryavata. Thus, divinities become devalued and magical spells and rites become ascendant (see Flood 1996; Brockington, 1992).

Further, the Vedas became the basis for an immense textual efflorescence, comprising manuals of ritual performances (Brahmanas, Aranyakas), and discursive speculative treatises (Upanishads, also called Vedanta, the culmination of the Veda), all of which bring us close to 300 BC. Schools of Vedic learning and ritual, called 'branches' (shakha), flourished, producing a cultural ambience of, at times, bewildering plurality within the Vedic framework.

But that is not all; Vedism gradually made way for the emergence of what is generally called—Hinduism on a sub continental scale, which brought more texts on more varied subjects into existence, notably the Grihya Sutras, which are guides to the performance of domestic rituals, and the Dharma Sutras, which have social ethics and law as their subject matter. Besides there are the Shraura Sutras which are technical treatises on the correct procedures for the performance of Vedic rituals of public significance. The Grihya Sutras have a regional character: a text followed in one part of the country may be unknown in another. The Vedic corpus considered revealed, is said to be based on shruti (that which has been heard) and constitutes the first source of dharma understood as righteous conduct. With the Sutras we come to the second source, namely, smriti (that which is remembered), and these texts are credited to human authors.

Later still than the Sutras are the Dharma Shastras, which continue with the same themes but in much greater detail. The best known of these texts today is the Manav Dharma Shastra, attributed to a seer called Manu, and therefore also known as the Manu Smriti. It is believed to have been composed between 200 BC and AD 300, which rules out single authorship. What stands out in this and other similar texts is the institutional framework for the conduct of both domestic life and public affairs.

In domestic life the key principles of varna (social class) and ashrama (stage of life) are adumbrated for the definition of appropriate rituals and worldly affairs. While universal norms (sarva sadharna dharma) are not wholly eliminated, but retained as the foundation of all righteous conduct, it is the varna-and ashrama- specific rules that emerge as preponderant. It is thus that Hinduism has been defined as varna-ashrama-dharma. Not only the householder but the kings too, are bound by their respective duties defined in terms of varna and ashrama (see Lingat 1973). As for those who repudiated such divisions, notably the renounces (sannyasis), even they have been grouped into sects (sampradayas) since at least the time of the composition of the Mahabharata (400 BC—AD 400). It is obvious that variant regional, Varna (including occupation), and ashram identities defined the appropriateness of behaviour in particular situations. In view of this Hinduism could only have been a family of faiths and the behaviour that went with them, and the Hindu society, a confederation of communities.

The speculative or philosophical concerns of the Brahmanical tradition were formulated as different systems of orthodox thought (jnan) and termed ‘versions’ (darshana) of life based on the Vedas. Each of the visions, six in number has its own authoritative texts. The thought or reflection that follows from each position is not exclusive in the manner of the various guides to ritual performance and social behaviour. The ‘root’ text of each darshana is concerned with extra-referential (paramarthika) knowledge, and transitive (vyavaharika) knowledge is built upon or grafted into it. Together they constitute what can only be called a complex totality.

The six schools are: (i) Samkhya (‘enumeration’) which asserts the ontological duality of matter (prakrti) and the ‘self’ (purusha); (ii) Yoga (‘joining’, ‘mixing’ ) which constitutes a pair with Samkhya in terms of its metaphysics; (iii) Mimamsa (Vedic exegesis) which takes a pluralist view of reality; (iv) Vedanta (‘culmination of Veda’), grouped with Mimamsa, which denies the reality of the many; (v) Nyaya (logic) and

(vi) Vaisesika (dialectics), considered a pair, which deal with logical, ontological, and dialectical issues within an empiricist, pluralist (more precisely atomist) framework (see Hiriyana 1949). The primacy which the monism of Vedanata has enjoyed in contemporary literature on India does little justice to the internal diversities of Brahmanical thought even when dealing with the same issues, or with its method of dealing with them to preclude mutual incomprehensibility.

The foregoing pluralities of scripture, metaphysics, and social organization that are the background of Hinduism and indeed partly constitute it, are characteristic of Brahmanical orthodoxy. This orthodoxy has not remained unchallenged. Indeed, the challenges came from within long before any major external threat materialized. The followers of public Vedic ritual called the Shrautra (shruti, ‘revelation’) first yield space to those who gave precedence to domestic rituals, whether the Smartas (followers of the Smritis or Dharma Shastras) or the Pauranikas (those who organize their religious life on the basis of the Puranas, which are legendary accounts of the doings of gods, goddesses and other supernatural beings as well as human being's life kings and ascetics). The latter two categories of Hinduism are not however, non-Vedic.

It is the Tantras, texts that are claimed by their followers the Tantrikas to be revealed, that are non-Vedic, Tantric rituals reveal considerable variety, but are generally characterized by secret rituals performed often at special sites such as cremation grounds, and frequently at night. Thus, Tantric rituals that invoke the power of the Supreme Goddess are performed at night in the famous temple of Puri (Orissa), where worship of the Pauranika God Jagannatha (in incarnation of Vishnu, the patron deity of Vaishnavas) and his divine consort is performed publicly during the day (see Marglin 1985). The celebrated yearly 'car festival' (ratha yatra) is dedicated to him.

While the worship of Vishnu is combined in the Smartha—Pauranika traditions with that of Devi (the goddess) and Shiva, in some parts of the country, particularly the south, mutually exclusive and often hostile sects have emerged centred on the cults of the two gods. From as early as the fifth century, the Vaishnavas were divided into the sects of Pancharatras and Vaikhanasa. Similarly, the Pashupata, Kapalika and Kalamukha sects were prominent among the Shaivas (see Lorenzen 1972). Starting in the seventh century, the Vaishnavas and the Shaivas began to generate distinctive liturgical texts called the samhitas and agamas respectively. Each sect claimed the supremacy of its own deity on the latter's own authority.

In the development of these theistic traditions, from around the closing centuries of the last millennium BC, a number of elements from various sources, including the high Sanskritic and folk religious traditions, fused. Personal devotion to one's chosen deity (bhakti), whether Vishnu in his various incarnations including most notably those of Rama and Krishna-Vaisudeva, or Shiva, is a striking characteristic of these cults, and originated in the south and then spread to the north. This devotionalism found expression in emotionally charged poetry particularly among the Vaishnavas from the sixth century onward, and later also among the Shaivites, though the latter's devotion tended to be more austere (See Ramanujan 1973, 1981).

Expectedly, the relationship of the devotee to the deity, whether expressed in human (anthromorphic) terms or through abstract formulations, constitutes the core of the speculative thought of these religious traditions, ranging from absolute monism (advaita), associated with the name Sankara (c.788-820), to qualified non-dualism (vishishtadvaita) of Ramanuja (c.1017-1137) and dualism (dvaita) elucidated by Madhava in the thirteenth century. The teachings of the latter two saints combine the metaphysics of the Upanishads with the theism of Vaishnava and Shaiva cults.

Associated with both of these is a third tradition, namely the worship of the great goddess, Devi, which emerged virtually independently as the Shakta (from shakti, 'power') tradition. Here also the roots go far back in time, perhaps to the Harappan culture, and later developments entail the amalgamation of Puranic, Tantric and folk goddesses and ideas. As Lakshmi, the divine consort of Vishnu, the great goddess is presented as a benign bearer of auspiciousness; as Uma-Parvati, she is the divine consort of Shiva, mother of the universe; and as Durga or Kali, the highest manifestation of divine power, she is the fearsome destroyer of evil and greater than all the male gods through the pooling of whose powers she comes into being. At the village level she appears as the goddess who brings and removes illness and misfortune, such as Shitala, the goddess whose visitations were held responsible for small-pox (see Hawley and Wulff 1996).

The Hindu religious tradition, we have seen, is characterized by strong pluralistic tendencies emanating from various sources and inspirations. It has tended to absorb non-Hindu religious ideas and practices and has dealt with internal dissent through accommodation carried to the furthest extremes. Occasionally, this strategy has failed and resulted in breakaway sects, which in the course of time grew into independent religions such as Buddhism and Jainism, adding a new dimension to the religious plurality of India.

9.3 ISLAM

The third and the youngest members of the family of Abrahamic religions, Islam ('submission to the will of God') is dated back to AD 622 when its promulgator, the Prophet Muhammad (AD 571-632) migrated from his native city of Makkah (in Arabia), where he did not receive the support he desired, to Madinah. In the latter city he established the first ever-Islamic state. He accommodated resident Jews and Christians in it, since they too were judged to be in possession of books of divinely revealed knowledge and, therefore, entitled to protection.

The fundamentals of religious faith and practice among Muslims ('the submitters') are explicit and universally binding. They must affirm the oneness of God and the status of the Quran {'the text to be read and recited'} as the word of God. Besides, they must believe in God's angels and messengers (of whom Muhammad was the most perfect and therefore the last); and in the Last Day, when God will judge the actions of one and all, and dispatch the pious to heaven and the sinners to hell (See Rahman 1979)

Moreover, every true Muslim must recite the creed (kalimah, 'the world'), which affirms the oneness of God and the finality of Muhammad's prophethood; say daily prayers (namaz) at the appointed times; observe the yearly month of fasting by day (rozah) to burn away sins give alms (zakat); and, if circumstances allow it, go in pilgrimage to Makkah (hajj) so as to be there on Idu'l-Azha. (This day it is generally believed, commemorates the willingness of Ibrahim (Abraham) to sacrifice his son Ismail on God's command). It is noteworthy that Indian Muslims do not include the waging of war (jihad) for the extermination of unbelief and the propagation of Islam among the obligations of a Muslim, as is done in many Muslim countries.

Islam is, however, more than the foregoing and similar other fundamentals. Everywhere it incorporates much that is local and pre-Islamic, whether this be in the Arab heartlands or in distant places such as India. Students of Islam have commented on this internal tension owing to its character as a world religion that admits of no variation (for instance, the daily prayers are everywhere said in Arabic) and with its regional, country or national characteristics for example, the worship of saints and relics, which is common in India.

It is widely believed among South Asian Muslims that the Prophet Muhammad had himself wanted to bring the people of India into the universal Islamic community (umma). Since Arab traders already had contact with the western seaboard of India from pre-Islamic days (the Mapilas of Kerala were born of mixed marriages of Arab men and Malayali women), they must have been the first carriers of the new faith to the subcontinent. Islam arrived here as a political force in AD 712, when Sind was conquered on behalf of the Umayyad caliphate and incorporated in it. With the new rulers came their advisers on matters concerning Muslim holy law, the shariah (see Ahmad 1964; Mujeeb 1967).

The numbers of the immigrants were naturally not large, and they were strangers who knew neither the culture, languages and religions (Buddhism and Hinduism both were present) of Sind, nor the prevailing system of governance. In the circumstances, native support was necessary, but this in turn entailed a conciliatory attitude towards Indians, which included the assurance that, by and large, there would be few restrictions on non-Islamic religions. In terms of strict Islamic orthodox, however, these religious could only be called ignorance (jahalat, incorrect belief). The long-term consequence of this initial compromise made for reasons of the State was two-fold: first, it laid the foundations of multi-religious polities in which Islam and the Indic religions would coexist, much to the chagrin of the guardians of orthodoxy; second, it sowed the seeds of an Indian Islam, accommodating Indian cultural traits and forms of social organization (notably caste).

From the time of major incursions of political Islam into India, beginning with the invasions of Mahamud, king of Ghazni, in the early years of the eleventh century, two kinds of religious specialists became prominent. These were the ulama (doctors of shariah or the holy law) and the Sufis, (mystics in search of direct religious experience). The ulama urged the kings to uphold shariah and be vigilant on behalf of their own religion rather than being tolerant of other misguided faiths. One such outstanding medieval scholar, Zia India-din Barani (c. AD 1280-1360) was of the opinion that the Muslim kings could not be the refuge of Islam unless they completely destroyed disbelief, polytheism, and idolatry. If the kings cannot actually exterminate the unbelievers (because they are so many), they surely should deny them authority and honour, he advised. Such extremist opinions, however, never became general among the ulama or ascendant in the ruling circles. The ulama actually split into two categories: while some of them confined themselves to their specialized duties and kept aloof from statecraft, others opted for a close relationship with the kings. The latter supported the actions of the rulers even when these were grounded in statecraft rather than true faith as interpreted by the ulama.

Islam spread throughout the length and breadth of India, less by the episodic coercion and violence of the kings, and more by the generally peaceful efforts of the ulama and the Sufis. In areas of mass conversion, notably East Bengal (or what is today Bangladesh) and the Kashmir valley, other factors also contributed (directly or indirectly) to the phenomenon. It is noteworthy, however, that at the time of partition in 1947, after 800 years of Muslim rule, no more than a quarter of all the people of India (400 million) were Muslims. In the Gangetic valley, where Muslims provided enormous support to the demand for Pakistan, fewer than two out of every ten Indians professed Islam.

When Islam reached India, it was already marked by divisions of various kinds. According to Muslim tradition, Muhammad himself had prophesized that there would be more sects (forqah) in Islam than among the children of Israel, but that they would all be sent to hell by God. Only those who followed his words and deeds, and of his closest companions, would be the ones to be saved (najiyah). They came to be called the Sunni (from Sunnah, customary way of life) or traditionalists or traditionalists, and account for the great majority of Indian Muslims. Their opponents are the Shiahs ('followers'), who came into being following Muhammad's death as the partisans of Ali, the Prophet's cousin and son-in'-law, whom they considered the legitimate successor (khalifah) and leader (imam). It was not Ali, however, but Muhammad's father-in-law, Abu Bakr, who was chosen, resulting in the Sunni-Shiah split which even today leads to violence in both India and Pakistan.

Besides the Shiahs it is the Sufis who are excoriated by the traditionalists. A connection has been sought to be established between the two heterodoxies by claiming Ali as one of the founders of Sufism (tasawwuf). According to another view, the Arabian philosophy derived from the teaching of al-Ghazzli (AD 1058-1111) was absorbed into Islam in the form of a mystical theology, but this locates Sufism late in the fifth century of Islam.

Some scholars including the renowned early medieval historian al-Biruni (AD 973-1048), found similarities between some key ideas of Sufism and the Brahmanical philosophy of Yoga or the magical Tantra. Indeed, it has been suggested that Abu Yazid Tayfur of Iran (d.874), a key figure in the development of Sufism, may have learned the principles of Brahmanical and Buddhist mysticism from Abu Ali of Sind who himself may have been a convert to Islam. Be that as it may, two general observations can be made. First, a considerable number of Indic elements are recognizable in Sufism in India, but only some of these are pure borrowings, the others being adaptations of classical Islamic Sufi ideas in the Indian cultural environment. Second, Sunni orthodox has always frowned upon both Shiahs and Sufis (see Rizvi 1978, 1982). Four major worldwide Sufi orders—namely, Chishti, Naqshbandi, Qadiri, and Suhrawardi—are present in India. Besides, there are numerous local orders of Faqirs and Darvesses: while some of them are seriously devout; the devotion to higher spiritual goals among others who are often given to excesses of various kinds including drug abuse, is highly suspect. Among the former, mention maybe made of the Rishi order of the Kashmir valley (see Khan 1994).

Islam was brought to Kashmir, it is generally believed, by the Kubrawi Sufi Sayyid Ali Hamadani late in the fourteenth century, but his efforts seem to have been confined to a small group of neo-converts in the city of Srinagar including the sultan. It was Shaikh Nuruddin (AD 1379-1442), the founder of the Rish order, who carried the new faith to the masses. His success owes much to not only his amiable disposition and peaceful methods of preaching but also to his familiarity with and adaptation of prevailing Brahmanical religious ideas and practices (Kashmir Shaivism). His choice of the name Rishi (a Sanskrit word meaning ‘seer’) for his order is itself revelatory. He adopted vegetarianism for himself and his followers out of his compassion for animals, and thus abjured the universal Muslim practice of animal sacrifice.

While some historians have written of two types of Sufism in Kashmir, the immigrant and the native, or the classical and the folk, others have denied the existence of this dichotomy, pointing out that Sufis of the Suhrawardi order and even the Kubrawis befriended and eulogized the Rishis. According to the latter, the Rishis’ very rootedness in Kashmir’s old religious traditions, combined with their exposure to the ideas of classical Sufism made them the ideal agents of the Islamization of Kashmir masses. It is noteworthy that Nuruddin claimed the Proper of Islam himself as the real founder of his order, locating himself at least notionally in shariah, the ‘highway’ of Islam.

It is not the Sufis alone who have contributed to the culture of religious diversity in Indian Islam. The reputedly more stringent ulama have also done so. Thus, in the late nineteenth century three groups of these doctors of the holy law of Islam led sectarian movements differentiated from one another by big issues (such as matters of belief and law) as well as small (including minutia of every day life). The most influential of these were the ulama of a famous seminary called the Darul Uloom at Deoband in north India (founded in 1867). Their educational programme too was grounded in the traditional curriculum and this opposed to the innovations and accommodations of western science that characterized the efforts of the modernists at the Mohammadan Anglo-Oriental College in Aligarh (founded in 1874).

Besides the Deobandis, the two other prominent reformist groups were the Ahl- I-Hadis (‘people of the tradition’) and the ulama of Bareilly popularly known as the Barelwis, who were opposed to both the other groups. In their disputations one or the other of the four recognized schools of Islamic law (Hanafi, Maliki, Shfii, Hanbali) were invoked, but the Hanafi school has always been the dominant one in India.

Finally, mention must be made of the Ahmadiyah sect which was formally proclaimed to be heretical and therefore a non-Muslim minority in Pakistan in 1974. Its founder, Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1839-1908) was born in Qadiyan, a village in north Punjab. Not trained as a Sufi, he was a law clerk by occupation. He also claimed to be the recipient of divine revelation and therefore the messiah (mabdi) promised to the Muslims. Although Ahmad did not dispute the Islamic belief in the closure of prophecy with Muhammad, he asserted that he belonged to a line of secondary prophets. Provoked and influenced by the work of Christian missionaries and the activities of the Hindu revivalist Arya Samaj movement, he organized his response on similar lines, and gathered a considerable following. The sect called Ahmadiyah, or Qadiyanis continues to be recognized as Muslim in India, but it really survives on sufferance.

9.4 Let us sum up

At the close of the lesson, we would argue that India has the ideology of religions pluralism. The state has no religion. But it respects on equal footing all the religions of the country. The state does not have any ill feeling about all these religions. Tolerance is the guiding spirit of Indian nation-states and it is called secularism. Hinduism tolerates by incorporating Buddhism, Jainism and Sikhism. As a matter of fact, for instance, in marriage Jainism and Sikhism are the parts of wider Hindu religion. Nation building in India has been developed by adopting such a policy toward other religions.

10.0 Objectives

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with:

- Buddhism as religion.
- Sikhism as religion.

10.1 Introduction

Buddhism and Sikhism are in a broader way parts of Hinduism. When larger brotherhood is discussed, it is manifestly said that wider Hinduism includes Buddhism and Sikhism. Historically speaking when Hinduism develops rigidity of Karmakand that is ritualism, Sikhism and Buddhism parted company with Hinduism. Similar is the case of Jainism. In contemporary Asia Buddhism has a wider spread. It has its adherents in the West also. However, it is a minority religion in India, the country of its origin. Named after the title Buddha (The enlightened one) of its founder, Gautama (c.563-483 BC), Buddhism began as a revolt against the Vedic pre-occupation with the supernatural, rejecting the beliefs as well as the rituals that went with them. The rejection repudiated the authority of the Brahmins. Gautama himself belong to the Kshatriya caste and indeed, he was successor to a kingdom the Bihar-Nepal area. Buddhism attracted disciplines that he taught the four noble truths which constitute the fundamentals of all schools of Buddhism.

10.2 Buddhism: India and beyond

Having originated in India, this great religion spread beyond its frontiers during Ashoka's time and afterwards penetrated into the major parts of Southeast Asia, China and the Far East. Of late, its influence has been rapidly growing not only in the East but also in the West. Today every fourth person in the world is a Buddhist. In fact, Buddhism is more a spiritual philosophy than a religion. Its attitude towards life has been placid and matter of act and its path is practical. Its emphasis on ethics, humanism, compassion and wisdom has all that can make it a universal religion.

The range of Buddhism is vast. In time it covers more than 2500 years. In space, it covers the Theravada countries like Sri Lanka, Burma, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos and parts of Bangladesh and India and the Mahayana countries, viz. Nepal, Bhutan, Tibet, Mongolia, Korea, Vietnam, Japan and China, although China is not strictly a Buddhist country as Taoism and Confucianism are also equally important religions there. However, Buddhism has dominated the thought of China for several centuries.

Wherever Buddhism spread, it influenced the indigenous culture of the country, be it China or Japan, Korea or Thailand. The art of the T'sang dynasty of China is considered to be one of the finest in the world and it is largely a Buddhist art. Various pagodas, wats or temples and beautiful images of the Buddha, stupas of Sanchi, caves of Ajanta, pillars of Ashoka with their capitals are a testimony to the exquisite art that developed under the influence of Buddhism. Also, Buddhism set such standards of tolerance, gentleness and compassion towards, the lower forms of life, that in the religious history of the world, we find few parallels.

Buddhism is the understanding of the teaching—for which the technical word is sasana or dhamma—of Gautama, the Buddha, and the religion and philosophy which have grown around that teaching during the Master's lifetime and during the succeeding centuries after his great passing away, mahaparinirvan

Sometimes Buddhism is wrongly presented as pessimistic. If this were true, we would not have found its adherents today in Burma, Thailand and other Theravada countries happy and merry, perhaps the merriest—as some observers have pointed out—people on earth.

Ironically, Buddhism is a religion without the conception of God. It may be included in the category of mystic religions in as much as it strives for inner purity and intuitive realization of the oneness of the universe.

Buddhism always fought against caste, colour and such other distinctions. It supported the freedom of women and their right to reach the higher spiritual realms. Its love for animals and nature is deeply reflected in scriptures. An enemy is to be won not by hatred but by love, for, as the Dhammapada (verse 5) says, hatred never ceases by hatred but by non-hatred.

This is the eternal law

Buddhism has always aimed at raising the quality of life, not the outward standard of living. There is little importance to 'self' in Buddhism. On the contrary, the self must be eliminated (see the Buddhist theory of Anatman-Anatta) to enter into enlightenment, for the idea of attachment to the self or selfishness leads to various vices and desires whereby one seeks worldly comforts now here, now there, little caring for the miseries and sufferings of others.

The contribution of Buddhism in the realm of mass media is no less important. It considered no language sacrosanct. In spite of the insistence of some bhikkhus or monks, Brahmins by birth, that the Buddha should preach in Vedic Sanskrit, he refused to oblige and instructed his disciples to preach his doctrine in the people's own language. His liberal attitude impressed the masses and that was one of the reasons for the popularity of Buddhism and its rapid progress.

The impression that Buddhism teaches other-worldliness and a life of retirement and seclusion is also unfounded. The Buddha himself after his Enlightenment, Bodhi, engaged in an active public career. He traveled widely for forty-five years, founded the Sangha or order of the Buddhist fraternity which included nuns also, visited many cities, towns and villages, meeting kings as well as commoners. Not only the Master but also his band of selfless preachers went from place to place spreading his doctrine.

The Buddha also introduced what we may call in modern parlance guided democracy in the Sangha. All official business in the formal meetings of the Sangha was transacted according to democratic methods. Every member had a vote and the decision of the Sangha was taken by a vote of the members of the Sangha. Not only during his lifetime did the Buddha manage the Sangha in a democratic spirit, but even after his death he did not want to restrict the freedom of the Sangha by appointing his heir. He declared before his mahaparinirvana or great decease that the Dhamma or doctrine and the Vinaya or code of conduct would lead the Sangha after him.

To encourage the virtues of detachment and non-possession, Buddhist monks were not allowed to own personal or private property. All furniture and other articles for the use of monks belonged to the Sangha. Thus, vested interests were discouraged. Monasteries or viharas became centers for the spread of Buddhist culture, some of them finally developing into excellent centers of education like Nalanda and Takshashila, Vikramshila and Odangapuri. They attracted students from abroad, as is testified from the accounts of Chinese travelers like Fa-hein, I- tsing and Yan Chwang, who visited India for pilgrimage to Buddhist places.

The message of the Buddha not only changed the course of Indian history but it also influenced tremendously our neighbouring countries. Maurice Winternitz has remarked that it is only with Buddhist literature that we gradually emerge into the broad daylight of history. A great part of Buddhist literature belongs to universal literature.

The legend of the Buddha even today preserves its ever-youthful freshness and vitality. It has inspired poets, writers, intellectuals and even the common man. His life 'has been the theme of various epics and dramas and many a poet has drawn inspiration from it. Edwin Arnold's classic epic, The Light of Asia, saw more than one hundred and fifty editions in the West.

- Cults of Buddhism

After the passing away of the Buddha, a schism developed in the Buddhist Sangha. Now that the Master was no more, there was reversal of his teaching and doctrinal differences began to grow. Various Buddhist councils were held to determine the meanings of the words of the Master and by the time of the third Buddhist council at the time of Ashoka, we are told, as many as eighteen schools had been formed. Differences and controversies that arose among the Buddhist sects showed the dynamism of Buddhist ideas that were influencing the thought currents of the time. Buddhism looked ahead, advanced and crossed the frontiers of India and conquered new lands without a single weapon but with its sublime message of love, compassion and wisdom.

Buddhist population in India is estimated at about thirty million. The concentration of Buddhists is to be found in Maharashtra where the founder of the neo-Buddhist movement and architect of the Indian constitution, the late Dr. B.R. Ambedkar, was converted to Buddhism at a special ceremony with a large number of his followers from the so-called 'untouchables' in 1956. Thus, the oppressed and downtrodden of the past centuries found in Buddhism finds a new means of advancement and psychological liberation. The neo-Buddhist movement has spread to other parts of the country and small pockets so Buddhist population can be found in U.P., M.P., Punjab, Gujarat, Tamil Nadu, Karnataka, etc. Buddhists in India generally follow the tenets of Theravada Buddhism but the Buddhist followers in the Himalayan region, namely, Ladakh, Sikkim, Lahul-Spiti, Darjeeling and parts of Assam are mostly Mahayanists.

The Himalayan Buddhists of Ladakh, Sikkim, etc are adherents of Buddhism which we may call 'Tibetan Buddhism' which is basically a part of the Mahayana complex, although there is a shift of emphasis on certain aspects of Mahayana, e.g. tantra and occultism, esoterism, etc. In fact, it is from Tibet that Buddhism was introduced into Ladakh and Sikkim, although it is ironical that these parts of India should receive the religion not directly from outside. But history has its quirks. However, it is believed by some scholars that in the earliest stages the credit for introducing Buddhism in the Himalayan region may be ascribed to the missionaries sent out by Ashoka.

Like Tibet, in Ladakh and Sikkim also, there is a strong feeling for region and the population is intensely religious. People are simple and honest and have great faith in the lamas. There are numerous monasteries and stupas and Ladakh and Sikkim and one can find the traditional sects of Tibetan Buddhism, namely, Kargud, Galuk Niyma and Sakya.

The exile of Dalai Lama and Tibetan refugees after the Chinese occupation of Tibet has been a blessing in disguise for the people of the Himalayan region in that the presence of Tibetan scholars has given a stimulus to studies in the Tibetan pattern of Buddhism and thus enriched the cultural and religious life of the entire Himalayan region. In fact, Indian Buddhism has become rich with the availability of Tibetan scholarship and Buddhist Himalayas on our side still richer with the treasures of Buddhist texts brought by Tibetans recently into our country.

Theravada Buddhism also spread to Burma, Ceylon, Thailand, Cambodia, Laos and its Mahayana form to China, Japan, Vietnam and Mongolia. Wherever Buddhism permeated, it assimilated local rites and customs. In Tibetan Buddhism along with the old doctrines, one finds magic and tantric cults also assimilated. Japan developed its 'Pure Land' Buddhism of salvation and grace and also 'Zen Buddhism' which believes that enlightenment comes instantly and directly into the heart of man.

Sri Lanka received Buddhism through Ashoka's son Mahindra and daughter Sanghamitra in the 3rd century B.C., while it was introduced into China in the first century A.D. when the Emperor Min ti invited two Indian monks to China to translate Indian Buddhist works. It was introduced into Burma in the same century. Japan received it in the 67th century A.D. through Korea. In Thailand, emulating the example of Ashoka's religious fervour and association with the Sangha, King Li-Tai (c.1400 A.D.) entered the Sangha for a brief period and thus commenced a close association between the royal house and the Sangha of Thailand. Till today both the royalty and the Sangha are highly venerated in Thailand. Thus, the Buddha's message spread in a large part of Asia and Buddhism is today one of the major religions of the world.

- The Doctrines of Buddhism

1. Three Marks: The fundamental teaching of the Buddha is that everything is impermanent or anicca, substance less or anatta and full of suffering or dukkhas. These are called the marks or lakkhanas of existence. These three were further extended and quite logically to the mark of shunya or void, which later became the fundamental doctrine of one of the most important schools of Buddhism named Madhyamika, the school founded by the great Acharya Nagarjuna.

Buddhism is explained briefly in the well-known and oft-quoted statement, whatever is born is subject to destruction. The texts of early Buddhism repeatedly tell us that a discipline attains an insight into the Dhamma when he realizes this fact. In fact, everything is transient and changing, but it is because of our attachment born of ignorance that we fail to see the truth and continue to live in our make-believe world and think that things are eternal. Origination and cessation, construction and destruction, these two factors are never at rest. According to Buddhism, there is no 'being' there is only 'becoming'. The universe is in a state of constant flux. According to the Buddha, the world is a wheel of becoming or bhavachakra which goes on and on. Nobody knows the beginning or the end of the world, samsara that which moves on.

The principle of impermanence logically leads to the theory of substancelessness or absence of any permanent 'self', 'soul' or 'ego' or atman. There are various theories about the permanence of soul in other religions. Buddhism recognizes no such entity and in this it stands unique in the history of human thought.

In the Buddha's view, this conception of soul, self, ego or I-ness is illusion born of ignorance or avijja. What then is man? The Buddha answers that a being is composed of states of mind and matter which are always in flux. In the Milinda-panha, the venerable Nagasena answers this question of King Milinda (Menander). He gives an example of a chariot. There is no central essence in a chariot. It is composed of yokes, spokes, framework, etc. Apart from these parts, there is no 'chariot' as such. Even so, a 'man' exists in and is composed of states of mind and matter. And these five states of being are: (1) Rupa or matter, (2) Vedana or sensations of pleasure, pain and indifference, (3) Samjna or cognition, (4) Samskara or synthetic mental states or karma-formations and (5) Vijnana or consciousness.

2. The Four Noble Truths

After the Enlightenment, in his first sermon at Sarnath, the Buddha propounded the four Noble Truths: (1) The Noble Truth of Suffering; (2) The Noble Truth of Arising or Samudaya of the Suffering, craving or Tanha; (3) The Noble Truth of cessation or Nirodha of suffering, or Nibbana; (4) The Noble Truth of the Path or Magga leading to the cessation of Suffering, the Noble Eightfold Path.

A. The Noble Truth of Suffering

As stated above, suffering is inherent in the very nature of things. It is omnipresent. Birth is suffering and similarly old age, disease, death, association with the unpleasant and separation from the loved one is suffering. Not getting what one desire, grief, lamentations, distress is suffering. In brief, all the five aggregates or khandhas are suffering. Thus, suffering is the fact, the truth of life. It is the realistic view of life. It is not pessimism, as some would call it. For, the Buddha does not stop at proclaiming suffering but he has also shown the way to get out of it. Pessimists believe that the world is full of misery and there is no way out of it. The Buddha admitted that there are different forms of happiness but they are all implementing, full of suffering and subject to change. We have our own experience that even the best enjoyments of life are transitory, fleeting and never lead to lasting or true satisfaction. Therefore, the Buddha is realistic and objective when he says, ‘Everything is dukkha’.

B. The Noble Truth of Arising of Suffering: Craving (Tanha)

According to the Buddha, the cause of suffering is not the wrath of gods or God or due to the arbitrary will of unknown powers above us. The cause of suffering is our craving which as the texts explain, leads to re-birth again and again and, is accompanied by lust, which seeks pleasure. Craving is never satisfied and manifests itself in various ways. The craving includes not only hankering after sense-pleasures, power, wealth, position but also attachment to ideas, views, opinions, theories and beliefs. All the trouble, according to the Buddha, arises out of selfish desires, which are never satisfied. In fact, there is no end to them. And clinging to these different cravings and seeking to satisfy them brings temporary successes and failures, hopes and disappointments, but never satisfaction itself. There fore, if one wants to get rid of suffering one must give up all kinds of craving.

C. The Noble Truth of Cessation of Suffering or Nirvana

The Buddha does not teach only suffering but shows the path to remove suffering. To eliminate suffering, one must eliminate its cause—desire, craving, thirst, whatever you call it, and nirvana is nothing but extinction of craving. The state of desirelessness, of absence of craving is nirvana, here and now. It is difficult to define nirvana, the most important term and also the final aim in Buddhism. Its nature can never be defined in words, although we do find various descriptions; for example, it is a placid state of mind, place of liberation, end of suffering, supreme joy, state of unshakable emancipation of mind, unconditioned state tranquility supreme, ambrosia, the end of birth and death, etc.

The ideal of Theravada Buddhism is nirvana and that of Mahayana is bodhi. Nirvana is mainly explained in two ways (a) blowing out of the flame of desire or extinguishing of fire or raga or lust, dosa or dvesha or malevolence and moha or delusion. In the older texts, a simile of wind blowing out the flame is given. Buddhaghosa, the celebrated Pali commentator, derives the term from nir+vana, a state without the jungle or vana or craving or tanha, i.e. the place in which the jungle of craving has been completely cleared, a state of quiescence of all cravings.

Bodhi literally means ‘awakening’ in extended connotation, it is ‘enlightenment’, ‘knowledge possessed by a Buddha. One who has obtained bodhi is a ‘buddha’. Bodhi is also found in early texts as a synonym for nirvana. Nirvana is sometimes interchangeably used for bodhi in later Buddhism (Mahayana). Generally, however nirvana is used to describe the state of arhathood and bodhi the state of Buddhahood. Arhats realize nirvana and Buddhas attain bodhi.

D. The Noble Truth of Way to the Cessation of Suffering: The Eightfold Path

The Buddha has shown us the path of the removal of suffering. It is the Noble Eightfold Path or Ariya—Atthangika Magga or Arya-Ashtangika Marga. The Eightfold Path is acknowledged as an excellent course of spiritual training, and has eight constituents or angas:

- Right Understanding or Samma ditthi
- Right Thought or Samma samkappa
- Right Speech or Samma vaca
- Right Action or Samma kammanta
- Right Livelihood or Samma ajiva
- Right Effort or Samma vayama
- Right Mindfulness or Samma sati
- Right Concentration or Samma samadhi

10.3 Sikhism

The Sikh religion, which originated in the Punjab in the teachings of Guru Nanak (1469-1539), is a monotheistic faith, whose adherents at present can be found all over India and in many other parts of the world too. Their estimated number is about twelve million. Their main homeland is the Indian part of the Punjab, but considerable Sikh populations are also found in the adjoining states, such as Haryana, Delhi, Himachal Pradesh and Jammu and Kashmir. Sikhs have settled in fairly large numbers in the larger towns of Uttar Pradesh, particularly after the partition of India in 1947. Migrating from their homes in Pakistan, they have gone and cultivated certain areas in Uttar Pradesh and Madhya Pradesh, which have normally been considered difficult and even dangerous. The Sikhs have added considerably to agricultural production there, and are considered excellent cultivators and farmers. In the larger towns, particularly Bombay, Calcutta and Kanpur, a large number of Sikhs are in various trades and vocations, and they run their own schools and colleges, besides their places of worship and participate usefully in the civic and economic life of the areas in which they now live. In most places they also run charitable instructions, such as hospitals and free feeding-houses for the poor. Where charity is concerned the Sikhs do not make any distinction of caste or creed, since one of the principal tenets of their faith enjoins them to look upon all mankind with brotherly feelings and to eschew narrow sectarianism. Abroad, the largest Sikh population is to be found in the United Kingdom (about a hundred thousand), in which they maintain their special traditions of piety and charity for all.

What has impressed the world most about the Sikhs is their superb martial quality. They make excellent soldiers and officers in all branches of the defence services of India and, because of their bravery, aptitude for discipline and traditions of fearlessness on the battlefield, are recruited in India's armed forces in greater numbers than their proportion in the population of India would warrant. Their ardent patriotism is another great quality which has won for them universal admiration and respect.

Sikhs can easily be recognized by their distinct physical appearance. They wear their hair and beards unshorn, and cover their head with a turban. No other headgear is permissible for them. They are remembered and addressed with the honorific of 'sardar' or 'sirdar', which means a man of high standing. All Sikh names end in 'Singh', which means a 'lion'. This is ordained by their last Apostle, Guru Gobind Singh.

Most Sikhs have come from the various Hindu tribes and castes. There have been conversions also. Considerable numbers of American-born persons have adopted the Sikh faith, and are seen to respect its observances with commendable loyalty. Sikhism, however, does not sanction belief in the caste system, and all human beings are held to be equally deserving of Divine grace, and equally entitled to receive the teachings of religion.

As stated earlier, Sikhism is a monotheistic faith. Its conception of the Supreme Being embraces both aspects conceived in Indian philosophy—the Unattributed, Nirguna, and the Attributed Saguna, Sargun. In its unattributed aspects, which are unknowable and inaccessible by the human mind, the Supreme Being is called Par-Brahma to emphasize its inscrutable and mystic character. This Brahma is known in more orthodox Sanskrit terminology as Brahman, and is different from the deity Brahma, the creative aspect of the Indian trinity. Guru Nanak preferred to designate the unattributed Supreme Being by the term Ek Onkar, Onkar set down as a syllable, akshara — unfragmented into letters. Ek Onkar stands at the beginning of the text of the Granmth Sahib, and is invoked on all occasions when divine blessing is to be sought and an atmosphere of holiness created. A pious Sikh, at the head of any writing, including letters, world inscribes this sacred syllable Ek Onkar. This is the equivalent of Par-Brahma or the Unattributed Supreme Being.

In its creative and attributive aspect, Ek Onkar is conceived as Onkar. According to Sikh philosophers, Onkar is Ek Onkar in its aspect of operating through maya. Maya in Sikh thought is the creative principle; it is that which is the object of the senses and the intellect, what in Greek philosophy is called phenomena. While the Supreme Being Ek Onkar, cannot be approached by the mind or the intellect but only in the mystic state or samadhi induced by divine grace. Maya and its manifestations are subject to cognition and the processes of the intellect. Maya being the principle of manifestation is looked upon also as the veil that conceals the essence, the eternal reality. Hence Maya is considered to be the source of the evil tendency in man's nature, and the fount of all actions proceeding from the five evils known to Indian ethical thought as kama, or lust, krodha, or wrath, violence, lobha or avarice, moha or illusion, attachment to material objects and ahamkar or egoism. The endeavor of a man of God, the seeker called jigyasu in Indian thought and Sikh, Gurmukh or one facing Godwards in Guru Nanak's system, is to transcend the lures and shackles of Maya. This is done through prayer, meditation and seva or selfless service to mankind. With all man's actions towards realization and transcendence of maya, divine grace is still held indispensable, for realization is a gift from on high, which no one by his own efforts can achieve. The seeker, under the Guru's guidance, must supplicate grace through prayer, humble service and meditation, and grace may descend upon him. With divine grace he will be able to achieve mukti, mokhsa or liberation, which in essence consists in transcending Maya and living perpetually with and in God. It is another name for the cessation of all desire and achievement of the sublime state wherein all passion and even the processes of the intellect are overcome.

In order to speak to the common folk in terms they would understand, Guru Nanak has also used the popularly current names for God drawn from mythology and the epics. Rama, Gopal, Murari, Narayan, Madho and such other names are employed by him in his hymns and poetical compositions. So also, attributive names, expressive of the higher qualities that the human self must endeavor to approach, such as dayal, compassionate, dayanidhi, ocean of compassion, sacha, holy, eternal, Thakur, lord, master and many more. From the Muslim tradition, too, that had become popular in certain sections of society in the north, are drawn not only Allah and Khuda, but also attributive names such as Karim, kind, benevolent, kahim, merciful Parvardigar, the Cherisher, Sahib, lord. This part of the Guru's vocabulary is intended especially to foster goodwill between Hindus and Muslims, so that all words expressive of devotion are found equally acceptable. There is no special deva-bani, divine language, and no language that may be held impure.

In Guru Nanak's teaching, certain terms stand out with colouring and emphasis especially given by him, and have become part of the Sikh tradition. These are Guru, Divine Guide, Kartar, Creator, Akal, Immortal, beyond time, Satti-Nam, the holy Name or Eternal Reality. A Sikh while contemplating spiritual truths must fix his kind on these terms. The characteristic Sikh term for God Wahguru, came after Guru Nanak's time in the course of the development of Sikh spiritual thought.

The path commended to the seeker in the Sikh faith is called Sahaj. Sahaj implies the way that does not violate or force any of the principles of nature. Not only is the Sikh faith opposed to the performance of miracles as a mark of spiritual eminence, but it has also positively disapproved the pursuit of such powers in the course of the Sadhana of various forms of yoga. Riddhi and Siddhi, which stand for the attainment of such powers and more so the control of demoniac power by cults like the Kapalika involving dark and unholy practices, have all received severe condemnation in the teaching of the Gurus of the Sikh faith. Hatha Yoga, involving the control of breath to arouse occult and secret powers, along with severe self-maceration as is the case with numerous mendicant orders in India, has been pronounced to be a path of delusion.

The path of Sahaj is the way of prayer, meditation, concentration of mind on the Divine Essence and of seeking grace. It does not involve enforced celibacy or taking to a life of mendicancy as a mark of holiness. On the contrary, following the example of Guru Nanak himself, the ideal seeker must perform such duties life as his members of a morally organized society requires of him. This may involve hard, honest work for a living, maintaining a family, grihastha and, if need be, making sacrifices for the upholding of the moral values, dharma. The steps in the path of sahaj are what in popular language have been called by Guru Nanak, suniyai, mannai and dhyana. These are, respectively, reverent 'listening' to or absorption of holy truths and texts, pondering these truths to develop faith in them, and concentration of the powers of the mind on the realization of God. Another element especially emphasized by Guru Nanak, along with the three mentioned already, is bhakti or devotion.

To enoble and purify life by conscious effort is the way of prayer, through forbearance, through search after enlightenment, through devotion and austerity and the practice of purity. Such are the elements of sahaj expressed differently (Japuji, stanza xxxviii). In this discipline, likened to the goldsmith's smithy, is forged the pure metal of personality, which is the mystic phrase which Guru Nanak has called Shabad, literally sound or holy word, purified consciousness. This is also the state wherein the divine glance of grace perpetually blesses the seeker.

For grace, which is such an important key-concept in Guru Nanak's thought, apart from Prasad which comes from the ancient Indian tradition, one used some synonyms from the Muslim sufi sources. The Sufis were seekers of spiritual truths. From the Indian sources, kirpa (kripa) and daya are also frequently employed, along with certain compound formalities—dayal, dayalu, kripalu. So mecherban, karim have been taken from Muslim sources.

10.4 Let us sum up

The Sikh religion during the five hundred years of its existence has played a significant role in the history of India as a liberating influence, as has been briefly indicated in the foregoing pages. Its influence as a spiritual force has been no less remarkable. It raised the human consciousness to the highest pinnacle of spirituality by inculcating devotion to the Sole Supreme Being (Ek Onkar) in terms going back to the foundations of the spiritual thought of India. That way it became a binding force and tended to eliminate sectarianism. As between the two great traditions, Hinduism and Islam, it sought to create a bridge of understanding, tolerance and goodwill. In ages before modern humanistic thought penetrated to India, it championed the abolition of untouchability and caste distinctions of high and low by birth. It pleaded for a better status for women. Even more significant was its synthesis of spirituality and action. That way it brought back the ancient wisdom of the Gita to the masses. It has thus exercised a great enlightening influence.

Last may be mentioned its role in bringing spiritual light to the common masses, in the simple everyday language that they could follow. While the learned of various faiths used classical languages which were sealed books to the people to contradict one another, it was Guru Nanak and his successors who brought spirituality and sweetness to the millions, thus conferring on them mukti. Their message also helped inspire the masses to liberate themselves from the age-old yoke of tyrants.

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with:

- Christianity as Religion
- About Church
- About the Bible

11.1 Introduction

Christians form a small minority in the religious statistics of India; only one out of every forty Indians is a Christian, about 20 million. They are fairly spread out; one finds them in practically all the sub-cultural areas and regions of the country. They are there not as 'settlers' or as 'foreign nationals' coming from some different place and culture; rather, they are sons of the soil and belong to one or another of the lifestyles that go to make up the complex mosaic of India. Dravidians or Aryans, high castes or low, city elite or tribals, factory workers or farmers in all the corners of the nation have accepted Jesus Christ as their guru and share with the Christians a common way of life.

There are differences in their distribution, no doubt. One finds a greater concentration of Christians in South India, since Christianity took root there in its very early centuries.

One of the most typical and noticeable activities of Christians is their Sunday gathering. For them Sunday is the day of the Lord. The worship generally includes hymns, various forms of prayers and the reading aloud of some passages from the Bible. Like hymns, these readings refer not only to God but also to the man Jesus Christ, alluded to as his son. At least on some important Sundays, most groups celebrate a symbolic ‘meal’ together, in which they remember and re-live in some way a very important event that took place during the last days of Jesus, around the first week-end of April of (probably) the year 30A.D.

The worship is celebrated in thousands of churches all over the country, Sunday after Sunday, and some churches even celebrate it every day. It is sung in the villages of Chotanagpur and in the cathedrals of Calcutta, Delhi, Bombay, Madras and Trivandrum. It is conducted in various forms and in many languages.

This form of worship generally referred to as Communion Service, the Eucharist, or the Lord’s Supper, goes back in remembrance of what Jesus did on the lat night he spent with his disciples and friends. Writing about it25 years later, St. Paul narrates the event in this way: ‘The Lord Jesus on the night when he was betrayed took bread and, when he had given thanks, he broke it, and said, “This is my body which is for you. Do this in remembrance of me.” In the same way he took the cup after super, saying “This cup is the new covenant in my blood. Do this, as often as you drink it in remembrance of me.”

The Sunday gathering is a continuation of the action of Jesus at his last supper. It contains a very important mystical element. It is not merely a prayer meeting; it is an occasion on which the remembrance of Jesus makes the community aware of what Jesus did and taught, and of his living presence among them and in the world. Thanks to this community gathering at ‘the Lord’s Supper’, the Christian life is an experience that ‘the Lord is alive’, and in this his new life, the meaning of his death is grasped as a source of grace for entire humankind. The memory of Jesus is, therefore, the core of the Christian religion. To understand Christianity, we must ask: Who was, or is, Jesus Christ?

Though Jesus is believed by Christians to be in a very unique sense ‘Son of God’, he does not thereby cease to be a man. The disciples knew him and knew that he had been born and had grown as any other man, subject to suffering to thirst, to hunger to ignorance even, as is inevitable in the human condition. The only thing he did not have is what can be avoided, and that is sin. Like every man, he finally died and yet he rose to new life. This means for the Christian not only that his Self was immortal but that in a wonderful way his whole personality, body and soul, was made new and alive in God. Incidentally, this belief in the resurrection is the reason for the importance Christians attach to the material world. They do not consider the world and the human body a prison from which man must escape. Evil and sin come from man's heart, not from matter. Matter is good; an essential part of man, for man is made by God not as an atman or soul that can exist perfectly without a body, but as a soul- in-matter, both aspects constituting the true reality and dignity of man. The body of Jesus rose then with him to the new life in God, although his new mode of existence no longer belongs to our spatio-temporal continuum. And like the body of Jesus, the final destiny of the world is to find its perfect reality in God.

Why did Jesus die on the cross? Externally, because of the opposition that his new ideas and preaching aroused in his own people, especially the leaders. But in a deeper, religious understanding of the event, this death had a special meaning. Christians have called it a yajna or a sacrifice, an offering to God, not just in order to restore the cosmic order, but rather to make a new union of man with God possible, and thus to conquer the massive sinfulness evident in the world. By the immense love and fidelity to the Father, which Jesus showed even at the time of his death, he opened a possibility for man to love God. There and then, God gave Himself to Jesus and to his brothers—the whole of mankind—in a new way. This means that by Jesus's life and death God redeems makes new and saves. Without that death and the subsequent new life, we would remain enclosed in our sinfulness. Thanks to his death, we can obtain a new life, a new power to love authentically, the perfect liberation. We never quite make full use of this power, but it manifests itself in our lives, and it is the power of God reaching all men through Jesus. This is God's grace.

11.2 The Church

Christians in India and elsewhere insist on the importance of the community of believers wherein they find the living memory of Jesus Christ. The Church has for them an important role to play in the task of salvation. They see man as essentially a member of a community, not an isolated island. Man's salvation cannot be found in pure isolation or kaivalya, or a mere individual escape from the sufferings of life. Salvation must include the building up of a true fellowship; and deep communion with all men. The Church is the new community where the bonds of friendship and love are expressed in their deepest institutional form, in so far as the union of hearts is expressed by the sharing of the same faith in God and the acceptance of the same Lord as savior.

This union of hearts and minds is not based on the racial bond of birth or caste, common language or culture, nor even on a uniform way of worship. In fact, with Christianity, there are many modes of worship even in the same Church, and new rites constantly emerge. The deeper union experienced in the Church is based on love and on the shared conviction of having been made one 'people' by God Himself through Jesus Christ. This union implies and calls for variety. An ancient description given of the Church is that it is both one and ‘catholic’. ‘Catholic’ means universal, capable of accepting and expressing itself in diverse forms of cultural and even of religious existence within the unity of the basic faith- experience. Thus, we have in India Christians from practically all its various subcultures and traditions. The Bengali Brahmin nationalist of the twentieth century. Brahmabandhav Upadhyay, could claim without betrayal of his Christian faith, I am a Hindu by birth, a Christian by rebirth.’ He considered himself what in reality he was a ‘Hindu-Christian.’

The Church exists in a world of pluralism of faiths and secular movements. The Christians are related to the larger community of men, both at the national and the international level. Within this larger community the Christians as a group should like to be they do not always succeed in bringing this wish into reality—a ‘servant Church’, a Church at the service of man after the example of Jesus Christ who did not come to be served but to serve (Matthew 20: 28). For this reason, the services which the Church organizes for the benefit of men educational, medical, social, religious are not exclusively for the Christian community, but are extended to members of other communities also. With these communities the Church is endeavoring more and more to enter into dialogue and to work together towards a common service of God and of man. An important text of the Catholic Church’s Second Vatican Council (1962-65) says; The Catholic Church rejects nothing which is true and holy in these (other) religions. She looks with sincere respect upon those ways of conduct and of life, those rules and teachings which though differing in many particulars from what she holds and sets forth, nevertheless often reflect a ray of that Truth which enlightens all men. Indeed, she proclaims and must ever proclaim Christ, ‘the way, the truth and the life (John 14:6), in whom men find the fullness of religious life and in whom God has reconciled all things to Himself (11 Corinthians:5:18-19). The Church, therefore, has this exhortation to her sons prudently and lovingly, through dialogue with the followers of other religions, and in witness of Christian faith and love to acknowledge, preserve and promote the spiritual and moral goods found among these mean as well as the values in their society and culture (Declaration on the Relationship of the Church to non-Christian Religions, 2).

The above somewhat idealistic picture of the Christian Church corresponds to the doctrinal framework of what Christians should be. The reality is far from perfect. One of the most painful aspects of Christian life in India and elsewhere is the fact that Christians are divided. It is not just the fact that there are different rites and traditions within the Church, for this is welcome; but that there is no complete agreement as to the doctrinal and ethical implications of the Gospel. The divisions for the most part have not originated in India itself; they have been imported here from the West.

There were, in the course of the twenty centuries of Christian history, two major periods of division. The first was the division in the eleventh century between the Churches in Western Europe, on the one hand, and those in Eastern Europe, on the other, including whatever remained of Christianity in North Africa and Asia Minor. For many centuries a constant estrangement had grown between these two groups, partly due to the division of the Roman Empire after the death of Theodosius (395 A.D.). The rupture became clear in 1054 with the controversies between the Pope's legates and the Patriarch of Constantinople (modern Istanbul). This first great division of Christendom was more political than doctrinal. Apart from the rejection of the supreme authority of the Pope of Rome, little really religious divides the Orthodox from the Roman Church.

Within the Western Church, a deeper division took place in the sixteenth century and developed further in the successive centuries. This was the 'Reformation', which started in Germany and soon spread through much of central and northern Europe and England. The main leaders of the separatist or 'reformed' party were Luther, Calvin, Zwingli and Melanchton. Eventually in England Henry VIII followed suit. This division entailed not only the rejection of the Pope but also of many changes in the doctrinal and later in the moral expressions of Christianity. The Reformation was, however, not primarily a movement of division but of purification. What the reformers wanted was the correction of abuses that had entered into the Christian way of life. But as a side effect a division of Christendom took place.

We have, therefore, at present three main bodies or groups of churches in the Christian world: the various churches of Eastern Europe and the Middle East, of which the Orthodox Church is the most representative; the Roman Catholic Church governed by the college of bishops with the Pope as head; and the various forms of reformed or Protestant Churches, some of which are quite close in belief and practice to the other two traditions (e.g. the Anglican Church), and others which have developed along new lines of doctrine and practice.

India has been the victim of these divisions of Christendom in the West. The first communities in India were part of the universal, undivided Church of antiquity. Such was the Malabar Church, in close contact with the Christian communities in Persia from where bishops had come in the early centuries. A solid tradition and strongly felt conviction is that S. Thomas, one of the disciples of Jesus, is the originator of this Church. In the sixteenth century, the Roman Catholic Church appeared on the scene. When the missionaries that came with the Portuguese met the Christian communities of Kerala, they compared notes on each other's faiths and practices. There was first a period of mutual recognition and acceptance but as could be expected at a period when communication was still very difficult, many misunderstandings and frictions arose. Eventually, part of the Church in Kerala acknowledged its communion with the People of Rome, while another part refused to accept it because it saw it as a threat of 'Latinization'. Thus, there emerged in Kerala the Jacobite Church, in direct communication with the Syrian Jacobite Church and the Catholic Church. From the former, the Mar-Thomas Church emerged in the 19th century. The Catholic Church consists of three different 'rites' (traditions and modes of worship); the Syro-Malabar, the Syro-Malankara and the Latin rites.

Although there are differences between these rites, there is no division in faith, and one notices a growing cooperation and awareness of their oneness. The Christian Church in Kerala has also spread to North India and brought with it its traditions and rites. Many of its priests and nuns have volunteered for work elsewhere in India and abroad. Several dedicated persons from the Church in Kerala have attained a high degree of holiness, like the Venerable Sister Alphonsa (1910-1949) and Fr. Kuriackos Chavara (1815-1871), founder of the monastic order of the Carmelites of Mary Immaculate. The whole Christian Church in North India, and indeed the country, owes a great debt of gratitude to the services of the Malabar Church.

The Latin branch of the Roman Catholic Church is spread throughout the country. It became firmly established in the sixteenth century mostly along the Western and Southern coasts of the country. Two important groups were then formed: the Goan-Mangalorean-Maharashtrian communities which became somewhat Westernized in language and culture, and the Tamil community which kept close to their ancient language and traditions. The Churches of the Western Coast have been, with the Kerala Christians, the main agents in the educational, social and medical services offered in many regions of India. They have produced outstanding patriots like the freedom fighter Kaka Baptista; important literary works like the Krista Purana of Fr. Stephens in early Marathi (early seventeenth century); and reputed artists like Angelo Fonseca and Trinidade. Also, saintly men of this community have given religious inspiration, like the Venerable Joseph Vaz (1651-1710), a missionary of Sri Lanka, and Fr. Agnelo de Souza (1869-1927) of the Missionary Society of St. F. Xavier, Pilar, in Goa, and St. Gonzalo Garcia, a Franciscan martyr for the Christian faith in Japan in the sixteenth century. In the history of the Tamilian Church, one of the most important events is the effort of Robert De Nobili (1577-1656) for a greater indigenisation of Christianity. Already in the sixteenth century he learned not only Tamil, but also Telugu and Sanskrit, adopted a sannyasi way of life and defended the customs of the Brahmins of that time as compatible with the Christian faith. His writings on the outcome of the Brahmins for his Roman authorities in the early seventeenth century give an astonishing amount of information about contemporary Hinduism in South India. Many companions followed his example and through their inspiring and saintly form of life, many castes people came to believe in Jesus Christ. Among them, Nilakantha Devasagayam Pillai (1712-1752) is reserved as a martyr. The first printed books in Indian languages came from this Christian community and classics of Tamil literature like C. Beschi's Thembavani (1726) are even today studied in South Indian Universities.

In the following centuries, the Roman Catholic Church established new important communities among the caste people of Andhra (seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) and among the tribals of Bihar and Assam (nineteenth and twentieth centuries), and among the scheduled castes in several parts of India, specially in the Gangetic plain (twentieth century). The Anglo-Indians generally being either to the Roman Catholic Church or to the Protestant Church.

Not that Christians were absent from North India before the nineteenth century. Apart from the early centers in contact with the Syrian Church, already in the sixteenth century the great Moghul emperor Akbar requested the presence of some Jesuit priests at his court to discuss religious matters. To these priests we owe some of the most fascinating historical accounts of life at the court of the Moghul emperors, as, for example, in Fr. Montserrate's memoirs (1582 and 1590). Thanks to a farmaan from Akbar, a small church was built at the Agra court around 1599. Later generations of missionaries continued to be accepted in the country, and to them we owe, among other cultural contributions, the first Sanskrit grammar written in a Western language, in Latin, by Roth nearly a century and a half before the better-known grammar of Colebrooke in 1805.

Meanwhile Protestant Christianity also made its appearance in India first with the arrival at Tranquebar of B. Ziegenbalg of the Lutheran Mission in 1706 and later with the landing in Calcutta of William Carey in 1793 who settled in Serampore, West Bengal from 800. To these churches and the many others that followed them in the succeeding centuries specially once the missionary societies were formed in the Protestant countries, we owe a great deal in the development regional languages and printing in India, particularly because of their concern for early translations of the Bible. These churches also paved the way for a growth of literacy all over the country and many of themes respected educational institutions of India were started under their patronage. One can truly say that the renaissance of India inaugurated by Raja Rammohan Roy in Bengal owes much to the work of these Christian churches. Among the outstanding mystics and saintly people of the Protestant Churches, we must remember Sadhu Sunder Singh (1889- 1929), Narayan Seshadri (1820-1891), Narayan Vaman Tilak (1861-1919), Dhanjibhai Naoroji (1820-1908) and the Rev. Imad-ud-Din (1822-1900) (cf .P.J. Thomas, 100 Indian Witnesses to Jesus Christ, Bombay,1974). A number of Protestant Christians, notably C.F. Andrews, worked side by side with Gandhiji in the struggle for social reform and political independence.

11.3 The Bible

Whatever be their denominational differences, Christian's share notes only the living memory of Jesus Christ, but a common sacred writing, the Bible or Holy Scripture. A great love of the Bible has been expressed in the twenty centuries of Christian history. Probably no other book has had a deeper influence on any civilization than the Bible on Christendom. No other book has surely been so much copied, illustrated, printed, studied, commented upon, analysed and paraphrased as this text, the first complete book ever to be printed way back in 1456. In most Christian prayer meetings portions of this book are read out and often commented on. In the Bible Christians find not merely a historical account of the life and teachings of Jesus, a record of the past. For them the Bible is a living book today: God's own Word resounds whenever these pages are read with faith and devotion.

This belief does not imply that the Bible is not a work of human authors, or that God 'dictated' its contents to men. Christians are aware and accept that the Bible is clearly the work of human minds and is written in very human languages of 20 or 25 centuries ago—Hebrew, Aramaic, Greek, often in a very beautiful style, but at times in quite clumsy expressions and through these words and styles of individual men, God's own word. His call and his presence come to meet man. This is the reason why Christians love and revere the Bible. However, for them the Bible never takes the place of Jesus Christ. In this sense, Christianity is not primarily a religion of the book, but a religion of Jesus.

The Bible is not in fact a 'book' in the modern sense of the word, but a collection of 73 writings dating from about the ninth century B.C. to the end of the first century A.D. The writings in the Bible are divided into two main sections: the 'Old Testament', with 46 writings and the 'New Testament' with 27. The Old Testament, nearly four times as long as the New Testament, corresponds to the Bible of Judaism and for Christians forms the background to and preparation for the New Testament which along refers directly and historically to the person of Jesus Christ.

The Old Testament writings consist first of a record of historical experiences of a people, the race of 'Israel'. The various vicissitudes in the history of Israel and the awareness its religious leaders had that God came to them as Saviour and that God is always faithful in His promises of mercy and love from the core of Old Testament literature. The most important event is the 'Exodus' or escape to freedom of a band of slaves working in Egypt. To this historical core were added the writings of the prophets who between the eighth and third centuries B.C. appeared in the history of Israel to explain to the people the religious meaning of the events in their national and political life. They constantly brought the people face to face with their infidelity, their oppression of the weak, their sinfulness, and reminded them of the demands for goodness and justice on the part of God, their Saviour. Further a collection of prayers or psalms and other songs often used in the public worship of the Jews, was also added to the Bible. These show a great sense of bhakti, and express feelings of trust, faith, love, repentance, etc. Another group of writings of the Old Testament expresses the deeper religious beliefs of the people regarding the origins of mankind (creation accounts) and of suffering (the 'Fall') and the meaning of history as progressing towards a great manifestation 'the Day of the Lord' (Apocalyptic literature). Finally, some stories and ‘Wisdom’ literature express the practical implications of a life of faith and dedication to God.

The New Testament consists of:

- (1) Four Gospels by Matthew, Mark, Luke, John on accounts of the life teaching, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ as experienced by his closest disciples;
- (2) A historical account of the earliest preaching in the Christian communities and the establishment of Christianity in the countries around the eastern Mediterranean Sea (the Acts of the Apostles, probably written by Luke);
- (3) Twenty-one letters or writings of the early disciples of Jesus, notably those of an outstanding mystic and thinker, St. Paul; which express the meaning of the person and work of Jesus and exhort the Christian communities to live their new faith enthusiastically; and
- (4) Finally, there is a symbolic writing, the book of ‘Revelation’ or ‘Apocalypse; its author endeavours to instill a sense of hope and courage in the early persecuted Christians, and uses very colourful symbols which are difficult to understand or interpret today.

All these writings, in spite of their heterogeneity, possess a clear religious unity, a common outlook on man and his relationship with God and a consistent view of the way of life based on Christian faith. Their teaching and symbols form the warp and woof of Christian culture. The Bible has been translated into all the known languages of the world, and new translations are made each year. In English, the well-beloved King James version (the authorized version) dates only from the seventeenth century. Today more updated translations are normally used.

In India, the burden of Bible translation and publication has mostly fallen on Protestant churches. The first printed Bible was a Tamil translation by Zieganbalg and Schultz in the early eighteenth century (NT in 1715: OT in 1726). But the most impressive effort was made from Serampore in Bengal, where William Carey ably assisted by Ward and Marshman published no less than 40 Bible translations between 1800 and 1834. Note all these translations are of high quality, but some became important contributions to the growth of the Indian languages. The process of correction and more faithful translation is constantly going on in all the languages and generally with the cooperation of all churches. Today the Bible is available in part or in whole in no less than 32 Indian languages.

- The Great Commandment

Once, towards the end of Jesus’ life, a pandit went up to him and put him this question: ‘Teacher, which is the greatest commandment in the law? Jesus answered:

You must love the Lord, your God, with all your heart, and with all your soul, and with your entire mind. This is the greatest and most important commandment. The second most important commandment is like this: You must love your neighbour as yourself. The whole Law of Moses and the teaching of the prophets depend on these two commandments.

(Matthew 22:36-40)

This precise, very definite teaching of Jesus is the dominating ideal of the Christian vision of life. Man is made to love and love means self-dedication, self-gift, self-sacrifice. The object of man’s love is first and foremost God, who alone is fully worthy of love and who Himself creates and saves man in love. The purpose of the Christian existence is to make this love come true in one’s life. Life eternal, which will extend beyond death, will be the flowering of this love in the presence of God Himself, experienced without any obstacle.

But this love for God finds its concrete expression in the love for other men. Nobody can love God who doesn’t love his fellowmen. And thus, the service of man is always in-built in the Christian religious ideal. All the activities and attitudes of men are ultimately judged by this single law of love; all efforts to promote great social justice in the world, all work for the building up of a new humanity where the unique dignity of each man is respected and where all have equal opportunities, all the struggle for the liberation of man from individual and structural oppression, every form of human activity, has a religious value if it is inspired by this law of love.

11.4 Let us sum up

Thus, to sum up in our world of clash and struggle, this law of love cannot be lived without a good deal of self-denial, of acceptance of sufferings, persecutions, and sacrifices that life may demand. We are called upon not to be frightened by them. Suffering has a mysterious value when mingled with love, for in suffering love manifests all its beauty. This is why the simplest and most powerful symbol of Christianity is the Cross: on this sign of torture and of shame Jesus, the Son of God, hung and gave His life in the fullness of love for God and for man. Through it, new life came to Him and to all of us. Through His cross, Christians hold, salvation comes to all men and this is exactly what Christians celebrate in their Sunday worship.

11.5 Self Assessment Questions

12.0 Objectives

The main objective of this lesson is to equip you with:

- Jainism as Religion
- Contributions of Jainism to Indian Culture
- Birth of Jainism

12.1 Introduction

Along with Hinduism and Buddhism, Jainism is one of the ancient religions of India. It still has its own limited following. Jainism preaches a path to spiritual deliverance through a disciplined way of life founded upon the principle of non-violence. In the course of its history, it evolved into a well-developed cultural system. The Jain cultural tradition made a significant contribution to Indian civilisation in various areas such as philosophy and logic, art and architecture, mathematics, astronomy and astrology, and literature. Though Jainism as a religion makes use of several religious concepts that are commonly found in Buddhism and Hinduism it has its own identity.

12.2 Birth of Jainism

Jainism was founded by Vardhamana Mahavira regarded as the 24th and the last Tirthankara, in the 6th Century B. C. It originated in the Ganga basin of North India, the scene of intense religious speculations, meditations and activity at that time, Buddhism too appeared in the very same region. Both the religions questioned the authority of the Vedas and rejected the ritudistic Brahmanic School. Jainism, thus developed as a protest against the exclusion of all but the Brahmins from the ascetic fraternity. The founders of both the religions though never met each other, travelled mostly in the same regions [Mithila, Sravasti, Magadha, Vaishali, Kaushambi and other places of the day] for the propagation of their faith.

Vardhamana Mahaveera, who was born in a Kshatriya family, received the training and education generally given to princes of the day. He soon realised the futility of worldly life and turned an ascetic at the age of 30. He practised hard penance and meditated for 12 years. At last, he attained the True Knowledge whiel meditating under the sal tree. He then became a “Jina” [conqueror] and Tirthankara. Afterwards he began to preach his doctrine and popularised “Ahimsa” and on it he built an ethical code for householders as well as for monks. He preached what he had realised for about 30 years and died at the age of 72 at Pavapuri in Patna District of Bihar.

- Main Teachings

Like the Buddha, Mahavira also held that the world was full of sufferings. The misen of “Samsara” was regarded as universal. Hence, he recommended a “moksha-magra” [path to salvation which consisted of three principles known as “Ratna Trayas” [Three Jewels]. These Principles are:

- Right Faith [Samyak Darshana],
- Right Knowledge [Samyak Jnana], and Right Conduct [Samyak Charita].

Mahavira also stressed upon the moral conduct. The Anuvrata or the moral code which he prescribed consists of the five important principles.

- a) Ahimsa [non-violence],
- b) Satya [truth]
- c) Asteya [non-stealing],
- d) Brahmacharya [control of sex],
- e) Aparigraha [free from greed]

Mahavira laid great emphasis on non-violence. In fact, all the religious rites of Jains are centred round non-violence. In no other school of philosophy do we find the application of non-violence as comprehensive as in Jainism.

Jainism, in course of time, got divided into two sects known as the Digambara and the Svetambara. Digambaras who are usually found in South India held that the monks should not wear any clothes, and the Svetambaras insisted that they should. Jainism, however in both forms is one as far as its philosophy is concerned.

Unlike Buddhism, Jainism did maintain good relationships with Hinduism. It employed Brahmin priests as its domestic priests who officiated at their birth rites and often acted as officials at their death and marriage ceremonies. It had a place for the Hindu Gods like Rama and Krishna in their temples. Mahavira's organisation took refuge in Hinduism whenever persecuted. To the side conquerors Jainism appeared only a part of the greater system, that is, Hinduism.

Jainism received royal patronage at the hands of some of the Indian rulers. It is said that Chandragupta Maurya became a follower of Bhadrabahu and accompanied his guru to Sarvanabelagola. In the 2nd century B.C., Kharavela of Kalinga popularised Jainism and setup several images. During the 5th and 12th centuries A.D. several southern ruling families like the Gangas, Kadambas, Chalukyas and Rashtrakutas of Manyakheta extended their patronage to Jainism. About 1100 A.D. Jainism became popular in Gujarat where the Chalukya kings, Siddharaya and his son Kumarapala openly professed Jainism and encouraged literature and building activities of the gurus.

12.3 Contributions of Jainism to Indian Culture

- 1. Jains Played an important part in the Linguistic Development: While the Brahmins established their supremacy over Sanskrit and Buddhists used Pali for the purpose of writing and preaching, the Jains used the local languages for their religious propaganda as well as for preserving their knowledge. The early Kannada classical works were written by Jain poets. Most of the major and minor epics in Tamil were also composed by the Jain authors.
- 2. Jainism has contributed to Indian art: The Jains erected stupas in honour of their saints. Jains built temples cut in rocks. The Jain marble temples at Mount Abu in Rajasthan display some of the finest examples of sculpture. The huge stone of Bahubali, known as Gomateshwara at Saravandabelagola and Karkala in Karnataka State are among the wonders of the world, the numerous Jain temples are found in Parshvanath Hills, Pavapuri, and Rajgir in Bihar and Girnar in Palitana in Kathiawad in Gujarat.
- 3. Jains gave great importance to Ahimsa or non-violence: All the acts prescribed by the religion are centred round "ahimsa". The Jain philosophy of Ahimsa was responsible for ending “ahimsa” in Yajnas and other Vedic rites. It inspired millions of people to adopt vegetarian diet.

4. Glorification of Human Heritage: Jainism holds that heaven is the privilege of man alone. The pleasures of even the Gods should come to an end one day or other unless they become men. This embodies an important truth namely, man's heritage as man is far superior to any other riches in the world. The main message of Jainism to mankind is that: “Be a man first and last, for the kingdom of God belongs to the son of man.” It is the same truth that is proclaimed in unmistakable arms by the upanishadic text: Tat Tvam asi” [Thou art that] Jains do not believe in the Creator of the world and hold that man's emancipation from the Karma is a personal effort. Man is the architect of his own destiny.

- Geographic Distribution of Jains

Jainism once held a wide sway in India, but now the followers of Jainism are numerically very small and they are found in both the northern and southern states. They do not constitute a majority anywhere in India. They constitute 0.4% of the population of India and their number hardly exceeds 3.4 million [1991 census]. The Jains are found relatively in a large number in states such as Maharashtra, Rajasthan, Gujarat, M. P., Karnataka, and U. P. In fact, 90% of them are found in these states only.

The Jain population is not growing fast in India. The population of all the six major religions of India has increased but Jains have increased only marginally, that is, by 4.42%, whereas the average rate of increase in the case of the other five religions was 26.77%. Its growth is almost stationary or only marginal. There are a few causes for that:

1. Jains do not allow widow remarriages. Comparatively, Jains have a low percentage of their women married in the age group of 15 to 39 years. For example, during 1911-31 almost 1/5 of their women in this age group were widows. It goes without saying that the enforced widowhood cut down Jain population to a large extent.
2. It is also said that Jains have a low fertility within the circle of marital relations. The number of married women is also said to be very low next only to the Parsis.
3. Jains are mostly urban dwellers. They are largely literate and hence have a liking for small families.
4. Jains do not believe in conversions. Unlike the Muslims and Christians, the Jains do not resort to conversion activities to acquire new converts, Jainism also does not get new entrants who join its fold voluntarily.

12.4 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude the Jain community, according to Sangave, a modern Jain sociologist, had an open class system: people could move from one class to another according to their aptitude. Untouchability is not practised among them and interdining is allowed. However, the Jains have endogamous Jatis. A 1314 document mentioned 87 Jatis is one branch of the community of these, 41 had a popular of less than 500. A more recent [1953] study estimates nearly 60 endogamous groups with population of less than one hundred each”.

13.0 Objectives

In this chapter the learner:

- will have an understanding of concepts
- know about different form of religious groups

13.1 Introduction

A saint is a person venerated for their holiness, originating from the Latin word "sanctus" and often associated with the Christian tradition, while a sant is a Sanskrit term referring to a devotional spiritual figure in Indian religions, particularly within the Bhakti movement, who achieves a state of spiritual realization and inspires others through righteous living and love for God. Though often conflated due to similar meanings, the terms have different linguistic roots and specific cultural contexts, with "sant" referring to a spiritual guide and "saint" being a person recognized by religious authority for sanctity.

13.2 Saints/Sants

A saint, also known as a hallow, is one who has been recognized for having an exceptional degree of holiness, sanctity, and virtue. While the English term "saint" originated in Christianity, the term is now used by historians of religion "in a more general way to refer to the state of special holiness that many religions attribute to certain people," with the Jewish Tzadik, the Islamic wali, the Hindu rishi or guru, and the Buddhist arahat or bodhisattva also referred to as saints. Depending on the religion, saints are recognized either through official church recognition or by popular acclaim.

In Christianity, "saint" has a wide variety of meanings, depending on its usage and the denomination. The original Christian usage referred to any believer who is "in Christ" and in whom Christ dwells, whether in heaven or in earth. In Orthodox and Catholic teachings, all Christians in heaven are considered to be saints, but some are considered to be worthy of higher honor, emulation, or veneration, with official church recognition given to some saints through canonization or glorification.

Saints

- Origin: The word "saint" comes from the Latin sanctus, meaning "holy".
- Christian Context: In Christianity, a saint is a person who has lived an exemplary holy life.
- Canonization: In some Christian churches, like the Catholic and Eastern Orthodox Churches, sainthood involves a formal process of canonization to officially recognize the individual.
- Role: Saints are believed to have a special connection with the sacred and may intercede on behalf of the living, acting as spiritual guides or figures of inspiration.
- Examples: Figures like St. Nicholas are well-known examples.

Sants

- Origin: The term "sant" comes from the Sanskrit root sat, meaning "truth, reality, or essence".
- Indian Religious Context: "Sant" primarily refers to a type of spiritual person in Indian traditions, especially the Bhakti tradition.
- Characteristics: Sants are known for their dedication to a shapeless God, emphasizing right conduct, soul purification, and freedom from worldly desires and materialism.
- Role: Sants motivate and inspire people towards spiritual and moral growth, providing teachings and guidance for attaining salvation and divine social life.
- Examples: Famous Indian sants include Kabir, Tulsidas, and Surdas.
- General characteristics

The English word saint is a translation of the Greek word (hagios), derived from the verb (hagiazo), which means "to set apart", "to sanctify" or "to make holy". The word appears 229 times in the original Greek manuscripts and appears 60 times in the King James version of the Christian New Testament. As used by the apostolic authors of scripture, saint did not refer to deceased persons who have been granted sainthood, but rather to living persons who had dedicated themselves to God.

The term in English was originally used in Christianity, though historians now use the term for representatives of all major religions who are considered worthy of veneration for their holiness or sanctity. Many religions also use similar concepts, but different terminology, to venerate individuals worthy of honor in some way. John A. Coleman S.J., Graduate Theological Union, Berkeley, wrote that saints across various cultures and religions have the following family resemblances:

- exemplary model;
- extraordinary teacher;
- wonder worker or source of benevolent power;
- intercessor;
- a life often refusing material attachments or comforts;
- possession of a special and revelatory relation to the holy.

While there are parallels between these (and other) concepts and that of sainthood, each of these concepts has specific meanings within a given religion. Also, new religious movements have sometimes taken to using the word in cases where the people so named would not be regarded as saints within mainstream Christianity.

The anthropologist Lawrence Babb in an article about Sathya Sai Baba asks the question "Who is a saint?", and responds by saying that in the symbolic infrastructure of some religions, there is the image of a certain extraordinary spiritual king's "miraculous powers", to whom frequently a certain moral presence is attributed. These saintly figures, he asserts", are "the focal points of spiritual force-fields", exerting "powerful attractive influence on followers but touch the inner lives of others in transforming ways as well.

❖ Key Differences and Similarities

- Etymology: "Saint" derives from Latin, while "sant" comes from Sanskrit.
- Context: "Saint" is often used in a Christian context, whereas "sant" is specific to Indian religious traditions.
- Focus: Both terms denote individuals of profound holiness, but the emphasis can differ, with Christian saints sometimes undergoing formal canonization, while sants are often recognized for their devotional poetry, spiritual wisdom, and societal impact within their respective traditions.
- Overlap: While distinct, the terms are sometimes used interchangeably because of their shared meaning of a holy or spiritually realized person, especially when referring to great figures of devotion in India.

- CHRISTIANITY

In the Anglican Communion and the Continuing Anglican movement, the title of Saint refers to a person who has been elevated by popular opinion as a pious and holy person. The saints are seen as models of holiness to be imitated, and as a 'cloud of witnesses' that strengthen and encourage the believer during his or her spiritual journey. The saints are seen as elder brothers and sisters in Christ. Official Anglican creeds recognise the existence of the saints in heaven.

So far as invocation of the saints is concerned, one of the Church of England's Articles of Religion "Of Purgatory" condemns "the Romish Doctrine concerning (the) Invocation of Saints" as "a fond thing vainly invented, and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God". However, each of the 44 member churches in the Anglican Communion are free to adopt and authorise their own official documents, and the Articles are not officially normative in all of them (e.g., The Episcopal Church USA, which relegates them to "Historical Documents"). Anglo-Catholics in Anglican provinces using the Articles often make a distinction between a "Romish" and a "Patristic" doctrine concerning the invocation of saints, permitting the latter.

In high-church contexts, such as Anglo-Catholicism, a saint is generally one to whom has been attributed a high level of holiness and sanctity. In this use, a saint is therefore not a believer, but one who has been transformed by virtue. In Roman Catholicism, a saint is a special sign of God's activity. The veneration of saints is sometimes misunderstood to be worship, in which case it is derisively termed "hagiolatry".

Some Anglicans and Anglican churches, particularly Anglo-Catholics, personally ask prayers of the saints. However, such a practice is seldom found in any official Anglican liturgy. Unusual examples of it are found in The Korean Liturgy 1938, the liturgy of the Diocese of Guiana 1959 and The Melanesian English Prayer Book.

Anglicans believe that the only effective Mediator between the believer and God -the Father, in terms of redemption and salvation, is God -the Son, Jesus Christ. Historical Anglicanism has drawn a distinction between the intercession of the saints and the invocation of the saints. The former was generally accepted in Anglican doctrine, while the latter was generally rejected. There are some, however, in Anglicanism, who do beseech the saints' intercession. Those who beseech the saints to intercede on their behalf make a distinction between "mediator" and "intercessor", and claim that asking for the prayers of the saints is no different in kind than asking for the prayers of living Christians. Anglican Catholics understand sainthood in a more Catholic or Orthodox way, often praying for intercessions from the saints and celebrating their feast days.

According to the Church of England, "a saint is one who is sanctified, as it translates in the Authorised King James Version" (1611).

Now therefore arise, 0 LORD God, into thy resting place, thou, and the ark of thy strength: let thy priests, O LORD God, be clothed with salvation, and let thy saints rejoice in goodness.

- Eastern Orthodoxy

In the Eastern Orthodox Church, a saint is defined as anyone who is in Heaven, whether recognized here on earth, or not. By this definition, Adam and Eve, Moses, the various prophets, except for the angels and archangels are all given the title of "Saint". Sainthood in the Orthodox Church does not necessarily reflect a moral model, but the communion with God: there are countless examples of people who lived in great sin and became saints by humility and repentance, such as Mary of Egypt, Moses the Ethiopian, and of course Dysmas, the repentant thief who was crucified. Therefore, a more complete definition of what a saint is, has to do with the way that saints, through their humility and their love of humankind, saved inside them the entire Church, and loved all people.

Orthodox belief considers that God reveals his saints through answered prayers and other miracles. Saints are usually recognized by a local community, often by people who directly knew them. As their popularity grows, they are often then recognized by the entire church. The formal process of recognition involves deliberation by a synod of bishops. If successful, this is followed by a service of Glorification in which the Saint is given a day on the church calendar to be celebrated by the entire church. This does not, however, make the person a saint; the person already was a saint and the Church ultimately recognized it.

It is believed that one of the ways the holiness (sanctity) of a person is revealed, is through the condition of their relics (remains). In some Orthodox countries (such as Greece, but not in Russia) graves are often reused after 3 to 5 years because of limited space. Bones are washed and placed in an ossuary, often with the person's name written on the skull. Occasionally when a body is exhumed something miraculous is reported as having occurred; exhumed bones are claimed to have given off a fragrance, like flowers, or a body is reported as having remained free of decay, despite not having been embalmed (traditionally the Orthodox do not embalm the dead) and having been buried for some years in the earth.

The reason relics are considered sacred is because, for the Orthodox, the separation of body and soul is unnatural. Body and soul both comprise the person, and in the end, body and soul will be reunited; therefore, the body of a saint shares in the "Holiness" of the soul of the saint. As a general rule only, clergy will touch relics in order to move them or carry them in procession, however, in veneration the faithful will kiss the relic to show love and respect toward the saint. Every altar in every Orthodox Church contains relics, usually of martyrs. Church interiors are covered with the Icons of saints.

Because the Church shows no true distinction between the living and the dead (the saints are considered to be alive in Heaven), saints are referred to as if they were still alive. Saints are venerated but not worshipped. They are believed to be able to intercede for salvation and help mankind either through direct communion with God, or by personal intervention.

13.3 Sadhus

In Hinduism, sadhu (sadhu, "good: good man, holy man") denotes an ascetic - wondering monk. Although the vast majority of sadhus are yogis, not all yogis are sadhus. The sadhu is solely dedicated to achieving moksha (liberation) in the fourth and final ashrama (stage of life), through meditation and contemplation of Brahman. Sadhus often wear ochre-colored clothing, symbolizing their sanyasa (renunciation).

- Etymology

The Sanskrit terms sadhu ("good man") and sadhvi ("good woman") refer to renouncers who have chosen to live a life apart from or on the edges of society in order to focus on their own spiritual practice.

The word comes from the Sanskrit root sadh, which means "reach one's goal". "Make straight". or "gain power over". The same root is used in the word sadhana, which means "spiritual practice".

- Sadhu rituals

Sadhus are sanyasi, or renunciates, who have left behind all material attachments and live in caves, forests and temples all over India and Nepal.

A Sadhu is usually referred to as Baba by common people. The word baba also means father, grandfather, or uncle in many Indian languages. Sometimes the respectful suffix -ji may also be added after baba. to give greater respect to the renunciate. It is also a term of endearment for small boys.

There are 4-5 million sadhus in India today and they are widely respected for their holiness and sometimes feared for their curses. It is also thought that the austere practices of the sadhus help to burn off their karma and that of the community at large. Thus, seen as benefiting society, sadhus are supported by donations from many people. However, reverence of sadhus is by no means universal in India. Historically and contemporarily, sadhus have often been viewed with a certain degree of suspicion, particularly amongst the urban populations of India. Today especially in popular pilgrimage cities, posing as a sadhu can be a means of acquiring income for non-devout beggars.

There are naked Naga (Digambara, or "sky-clad") Sadhus which are non-shaven and wear their hair in thick dreadlocks, and Jata, who carry swords. Aghora sadhus may claim to keep company with ghosts, or live in cemeteries as part of their holy path. Indian culture tends to emphasize an infinite number of paths to God, such that sadhus, and the varieties that sadhus come in have their place.

- Sadhu sects

Sadhus engage in a wide variety of religious practices. Some practice extreme asceticism while others focus on praying, chanting or meditating.

There are two primary sectarian divisions within the sadhu community: Shaiva Sadhu; ascetics devoted to Shiva, and Vaishnava Sadhu, renouncers devoted to Vishnu and/or his incarnations, which include Rama and Krishna. Less numerous are Shakta sadhus, who are devoted to Shakti. Within these general divisions are numerous sects and subsects, reflecting different lineages and philosophical schools and traditions (often referred to as "sampradayas").

The Dashanami Sampradaya is Smartists; sadhus in the sect take one of the ten names as an appellation upon initiation. The sect is said to have been formed by the philosopher and renunciant Adi Shankara, believed to have lived in the 8th century CE, though the full history of the sect's formation is not clear.

While sadhus ostensibly leave behind traditional caste at initiation, the caste backgrounds of initiates do influence the sects into which they are admitted; certain ascetic groups, such as the Dandis within the Dashnami sampradaya, are composed only of men of brahmin birth, while other groups admit people from a wide variety of caste backgrounds.

Female sadhus (sadhvis) exist in many sects. In many cases, the women that take to the life of renunciation are widows, and these types of sadhvis often live secluded lives in ascetic compounds. Sadhvis are sometimes regarded by some as manifestations or forms of the Goddess, or Devi, and are honored as such. There have been a number of charismatic sadhvis that have risen to fame as religious teachers in contemporary India (e.g.- Anandamayi Maa, Sarada Devi, Mata Amritanandamayi and Karunamayi).

- Becoming a sadhu

The processes and rituals of becoming a sadhu vary with sect; in almost all sects, a sadhu is initiated by a guru, who bestows upon the initiate a new name, as well as a mantra, (or sacred sound or phrase), which is generally known only to the sadhu and the guru and may be repeated by the initiate as part of meditative practice.

Becoming a sadhu is a path followed by millions. It is supposed to be the fourth phase in a Hindu's life, after studies being a father and a pilgrim, but for most it is not a practical option. For a person to become sadhu needs vairagya. Vairagya means desire to achieve something by leaving the world (cutting familial, societal and earthly attachments).

A person who wants to become sadhu must first seek a guru. There, he or she must perform 'guruseva' which means service. The guru decides whether the person is eligible to take sannyasa by observing the sisya (the person who wants to become a sadhu or sanyasi). If the person is eligible, 'guru upadesa' (which means teachings) is done only then, the person transforms into sanyasi or sadhu. There are different types of sanyasis in India who follow different sampradaya. But, all sadhus have a common goal: attaining moksha (liberation).

Living as a sadhu is a difficult lifestyle. Sadhus are considered to be dead unto themselves, and legally dead to the country of India. As a ritual, they may be required to attend their own funeral before following a guru for many years, serving him by doing menial tasks until acquiring the necessary experience to leave his leadership.

While the life of renunciation is described as the fourth stage of life in the classical Sanskrit literature of Hindu tradition, and the members of certain sects - particularly those dominated by initiates of Brahman background - have typically lived as householders and raised families before becoming sadhus, many sects are composed of men that have renounced early in life, often in their late teens or early 20s. In a few cases, those who choose the sadhu life are fleeing from family or financial situations which they have found to be untenable, if there is some worldly debt that remains to be repaid, would-be renunciates are encouraged by their gurus to pay off those debts before they become sadhus.

- Lifestyle

The ruggedness of the sadhu life deters many from following the sadhu path. Such practices as the obligatory early morning bath in the cold mountains require a detachment from common luxuries. After the bath, sadhus gather around the dhuni, or holy fireplace, and begin with their prayers and meditation for the day.

Some sadhus dispense cures to the local community, remove evil eyes or bless a marriage. They are a walking reminder to the average Hindu of Divinity. They are generally allowed free passage on the trains and are a close-knit organization.

Kumbh Mela, a mass-gathering of sadhus from all parts of India, takes place every three years at one of four points along sacred rivers in India, including the holy River Ganges. In 2007 it was held in Nasik, Maharashtra. Peter Owen-Jones filmed one episode of "Extreme Pilgrim" there during this event. It took place again in Haridwar in 2010; Sadhus of all sects join in this reunion. Millions of non-sadhu pilgrims also attend the festivals, and the Kumbh Mela is the largest gathering of human beings for a single religious purpose on the planet. Another Kumbh Mela was held on 27 -January-2013 at Allahabad.

The lives of sadhus in contemporary India vary tremendously. Sadhus live in ashrams and temples in the midst of major urban centers, in huts on the edges of villages, in caves in the remote mountains. Others live lives of perpetual pilgrimage, moving without ceasing from one town, one holy place, to another. Some gurus live with one or two disciples; some ascetics are solitary, while others live in large, communal institutions. For some sadhus the brotherhood or sisterhood of ascetics is very important.

The rigor of the spiritual practices in which contemporary sadhus engage also varies a great deal. Apart from the very few that engage in the most dramatic, striking austerities-for example, standing on one leg for years on end or remaining silent for a dozen years-most sadhus engage in some form of religious practice: devotional worship, hatha yoga, fasting, etc. For many sadhus, consumption of certain forms of cannabis (bhang) is accorded a religious significance. Sadhus occupy a unique and important place in Hindu society, particularly in villages and small towns more closely tied to tradition. In addition to bestowing religious instruction and blessings to lay people, sadhus are often called upon to adjudicate disputes between individuals or to intervene in conflicts within families. Sadhus are also living embodiments of the divine, images of what human life, in the Hindu view, is truly about - religious illumination and liberation from the cycle of birth and death.

Though some ascetic sects possess properties that generate revenue to sustain members, most sadhus rely on the donations of lay people; poverty and hunger are ever-present realities for many sadhus.

13.4 Shrines

A Shrine (Latin: Scrinium "Case or chest for books or papers"; Old French: escrin "box or case") is a holy or sacred place, which is dedicated to a specific deity, ancestor, hero, martyr, saint, demon or similar figure of admiration and respect, at which they are venerated or worshipped. Shrines often contain idols, relics, or other such objects associated with the figure being venerated. A shrine at which offerings are made is called an altar means table on which religious offering are made. Shrines are found in many of the world's religions, including Christianity, Islam, Hinduism, Buddhism, Chinese folk religion and Shinto, as well as in secular and non-religious settings such as a war memorial. Shrines can be found in various settings, such as churches, temples, cemeteries, or in the home, although portable shrines are also found in some cultures.

- Types of shrines

1. Temple shrines

Many shrines are located within buildings designed specifically for worship, such as a church in Christianity, or a mandir in Hinduism. A shrine here is usually the centre of attention in the building, and is given a place of prominence. In such cases, adherents of the faith assemble within the building in order to venerate the deity at the shrine.

2. Household shrines

Historically in Hinduism, Buddhism and Roman Catholicism and also in modern faiths such as Neopaganism a shrine can commonly be found within the home or shop. This shrine is usually a small structure or a setup of pictures and figurines dedicated to a deity that is part of the official religion, to ancestors or to a localised household deity.

Small household shrines are very common among the Chinese and people from South and Southeast Asia, whether Hindu, Buddhist or Christian. Usually, a small lamp and small offerings are kept daily by the shrine. Buddhist household shrines must be on a shelf above the head; Chinese shrines must stand directly on the floor.

3. Yard shrines

Small outdoor yard shrines are found at the places of many peoples, following various religions, including historically, Christianity. Many consist of a statue of Christ or a saint, on a pedestal or in an alcove, while others may be elaborate booths without ceilings; some include paintings and architectural elements, such as walls, roofs, glass doors and ironwork fences, etc.

In the United States, some Christians have small yard shrines; some of these resemble side altars, since they are composed of a statue placed in a niche or grotto; this type is colloquially referred to as a bathtub madonna.

4. Religious Shrines

Shrines are found in most, though not all, religions. As distinguished from a temple, a shrine usually houses a particular relic or cult image, which is the object of worship or veneration, or is constructed to set apart a site which is thought to be particularly holy, as opposed to being placed for the convenience of worshippers. Shrines therefore attract the practice of pilgrimage.

• Shrines in Christianity

Shrines are found in many, though not all forms of Christianity. Roman Catholicism, the largest denomination of Christianity, has many shrines, as do Orthodox Christianity and Anglicanism.

In the Roman Catholic Code of Canon law, canons 1230 and 1231 read: "The term shrine means a church or other sacred place which, with the approval of the local Ordinary, is by reason of special devotion frequented by the faithful as pilgrims. For a shrine to be described as national, the approval of the Episcopal Conference is necessary.

Another use of the term "shrine" in colloquial Catholic terminology is a niche or alcove in most - especially larger - Churches used by parishioners when praying privately in the church. They were also called Devotional Altars. since they could look like small Side Altars or bye-altars. Shrines were always centered on some image of Christ or a saint - for instance a statue, painting, mural or mosaic and may have had a reredos behind them (without a Tabernacle built in).

However, Mass would not be celebrated at them: they were simply used to aid or give a visual focus for prayers. Side altars, where Mass could actually be celebrated, were used in a similar way to shrines by parishioners. Side altars were specifically dedicated to The Virgin Mary, Saint Joseph as well as other saints.

- Shrines in Islam

According to the classical chief sources of legislation and jurisprudence in orthodox Sunni Islam, primarily the Quran and Hadith texts (and notably the practice of the Salafi school of thought and early Muslims), it is understood to be totally forbidden to build structures over graves based on the legal evidences where the Prophet Muhammad ordered to demolish all the structures over graves and forbade acts of worship at the graveyards (aside from the funeral prayer) including calling upon other than Allah. It is commonly misunderstood that the grave of the Prophet is an exception to this rule however historically the grave was originally located in the home of Aisha and the Mosque was extended over and the grave incorporated due to lack of space for the growing number of worshipers.

- It was narrated that Abu'l-Hayaaj al-Asadi said: 'Ali ibn Abi Taalib said to me: "Shall I not send you on the same mission as the Messenger of Allah sent me?"
(Narrated by Muslim, 969).
- It was narrated that he (peace and blessings of Allaah be upon him) said: "May Allah curse the Jews and the Christians, for they took the graves of their Prophets as places of worship." 'Aa'ishah (may Allaah be pleased with her) said, "He was warning against what they had done." (Narrated by al-Bukhaari, 1330 and by Muslim, 529).
- And when Umm Salamah and Umm Habeebah told him about a church in which there were images, he (peace and blessings of Allaah be upon him) said: "When a righteous man died among them, they would build a place of worship over his grave and put those images in it. They are the evilest of mankind before Allaah." (Saheeh, agreed upon. Narrated by al-Bukhari, 427 and by Muslim, 528).
- And he (peace and blessings of Allaah be upon him) said: "Those who came before you took the graves of their Prophets and righteous people as places of worship. Do not take graves as places of worship - I forbid you to do that." (Narrated in his Saheeh by Muslim, 532, from Jundab ibn 'AbdAllaah al-Bajali).
- From Surah Al Jinn "The places of worship are for Allah (alone): So do not invoke anyone beside Allah."

There is a clear prohibition of raising the grave in the name of venerating the dead as it may lead to Shirk such as accounted in the story of the people of Noah, from Surah An Nuh 71: 23 it is quoted:

"And they have said: 'You shall not leave your gods, nor shall you leave Wadd, nor Suwa', nor Yaghuth, nor Ya'uq, nor Nasr (these are the names of their idols)."

Ibn Abbas commented on this saying, "These are the names of the pious people from among them. Following their deaths, Shaytan inspired their people to erect status in the place where they used to sit, and to call them with their names. They did so, however at this point, they were not worshiped until that generation died and the new generation deviated. "

However, in contrast to this, throughout parts of the Islamic world there has developed a deep cultural tradition of shrine veneration. Although classically in orthodox Islam it is prohibited to worship or engage in acts of worship surrounding graves; various movements and sects took the stance that it is permitted to supplicate with the 'Tawasul' or intercession of the deceased pious person (Sufi/Wali). For these groups, shrines hold a notable position and considered as places to seek spiritual guidance. Most venerated shrines are dedicated to various Sufi Saints and are widely scattered throughout the Islamic world. For them it is seen as a tradition to commemorate the death of the Saint, by holding festivals at his tomb to commemorate his life. In several countries, the local shrine is a focal point of the community, with several localities named specifically for the local saint.

In some parts of the Islamic world, such as in Pakistan, these festivals are multi-day events and even draw members of the Hindu and Christian minority who often revere the Muslim saint, such as in the case of the famous Lal Baz Qalandar shrine in Sindh, Pakistan - an important example of religious syncretism that blurs the distinction between members of different religions. Sufi shrines in Bangladesh, India, and Pakistan are also host to a night of commemoration by Mehfil Samaaa (Qawali) and 'Zikr' every Thursday. Some academics assert that such practices were influenced by Hinduism long ago, when Muslims and Hindus co-existed in the sub-continent.

In Turkey, the famous Sufi Whirling Dervishes perform their whirling at the shrine of Jalal-ud-Din Rumi in Konya, while in Morocco and Algeria, brotherhoods of Black African Sufis, the Gnouia, perform elaborate songs at the shrines of their Saints.

Numerous shrines were once located in Saudi Arabia in its initial days. However, due to the revival of Islamic orthodoxy by Muhammad ibn Abd al- Wahhab (strongly clinging to the Hadith texts and Quran) against developed cultural practices they were destroyed by local authorities who identified them as sources of Shirk and of being reprehensible innovations in Islam or 'Bid'ah'. Other important Shrines were once found in Central Asia, but many were destroyed by the Soviets.

Shia's have several shrines dedicated to various religious figures important in their history, and several elaborate shrines are dedicated to Shia Saints and religious figures, most notably in Kerbala. Najaf and Samarra in Iraq. and Qum and Mashad in Iran. Other important Shia shrines are located in Mazar-e-Sharif ("the Noble Shrine") in Afghanistan and in Damascus, Syria.

- Shrines in Buddhism

In Buddhism, a shrine refers to a place where veneration is focused on the Buddha or one of the bodhisattvas. Monks, nuns and laypeople all give offerings to these revered figures at these shrines and also meditate in front of them.

Typically, Buddhist shrines contain a statue of either the Buddha, or (in the Mahayana and Vajrayana forms of Buddhism), one of the various bodhisattvas. They also commonly contain candles, along with offerings such as flowers, purified water, food, and incense. Many shrines also contain sacred relics, such as the alleged tooth of the Buddha held at a shrine in Sri Lanka.

Site-specific shrines in Buddhism, particularly those that contain relics of deceased buddhas and revered monks, are often designed in the traditional form known as the stupa.

- Shrines in Hinduism

In Hinduism, a shrine is a place where a god or goddess is worshipped. Shrines are typically located inside a temple known as a mandir, though many Hindus also have a household shrine as well. Sometimes a human is venerated at a Hindu shrine along with a deity, for instance the 19th century religious teacher Sri Ramakrishna is venerated at the Ramakrishna Temple in Kolkata, India.

Central to a Hindu shrine is a statue of a deity, which is known as a murti. Hindus believe that the deity that they are worshiping actually enters and inhabits the murti. This is given offerings like candles, food, flowers, and incense. In some cases, particularly among devotees of the goddess Kali in northern India, animals are sacrificed to the deity (animal sacrifice is not a part of Hinduism).

At a mandir, the congregation often assembles in front of a shrine, and, led by priests, give offerings and sing devotional hymns.

- Shrines in Taoism

The line between a temple and a shrine in Taoism is not fully defined; shrines are usually smaller versions of larger Taoist temples or small places in a home where a yin-yang emblem is placed among peaceful settings to encourage meditation and study of Taoist texts and principles. Taoists place less emphasis on formalized attendance and ritualized worship than other Asian religions, formal temples and structures of worship came about in Taoism mostly in order to prevent losing adherents to Buddhism. Frequent features of Taoist shrines include the same features as full temples, often including any or all of the following features: gardens, running water or fountains, small burning braziers or candles (with or without incense), and copies of Taoist texts such as the Tao Te Ching, Zhuangzi or other texts by Lao Tzu, Chuang Tzu or other Taoist sages.

As with all Taoist worship, Taoist shrines are organized around a sense of appreciation of nature and surroundings that inspire meditation on, and living in accordance with, the Tao ("Way" or "Path", a concept of living harmoniously with one's natural surroundings and environment) and the Three Jewels of Taoism (different from Buddhism's concept of Three Jewels) - compassion, moderation, and

13.5 Let us sum up

Religious places, such as temples, mosques, monasteries, and holy cities, serve as sites for worship, community gathering, and spiritual growth, offering unique cultural and historical experiences that attract pilgrims and tourists. They are vital for maintaining religious and cultural harmony, preserving traditions, and fostering peace and reconciliation, though legal and political issues sometimes create challenges in their management and preservation.

The main objective of this lesson is to equip you with:

- The concept of Fundamentalism and Communalism
- About Ethnic Violence
- About Communal Violence
- Features of Communal Riots
- The Concept of Secularism

14.1 Introduction

Whenever we talk about Fundamentalism in India we are concerned with religious fundamentalism. Fundamentalism is a movement or belief for a return to the basic texts or fundamentals of revealed religion—usually contrasted, therefore, with modernism and liberalism in religion. In India fundamentalism is related to Hindu fundamentalism and Muslim fundamentalism. There is ideology of conservative political parties, which go back to rigid Hinduism—Ram Mandir and mythological heroes. The Muslim fundamentalism on the other hand looks back to Babri Masjid. These two fundamentalists do not agree on Mosque or temple.

14.2 FUNDAMENTALISM

Fundamentalism is a term used to describe a group's tendency to strictly and literally follow certain specific scriptures, dogmas, or ideologies, often in religious contexts. It emphasizes the importance of maintaining ingroup and outgroup distinctions. Fundamentalists focus on purity and strive to return to previous ideals that they believe their members have deviated from. They often reject diversity of opinion when it comes to these established “fundamentals” and their accepted interpretation within the group.

The term “fundamentalism” can be pejorative, depending on the context. It carries a set of negative connotations that its own adherents may hesitate to associate with. The present-day Hindu-Muslim conflict is not really a religious conflict, nor is it rooted in medieval history, as is often assumed. Political conflict between the likes of Aurangzeb and Shivaji and religious persecution of the Hindus by certain Muslim rulers notwithstanding, India does not have a history of devastating, centuries-long religious denominational wars. Nor do we have a chronic history of Hindu-Muslim riots in pre- British India. Following the period of Islamic invasions, the conflict with the invading Afghani, Mughal and Turkish Muslims came to be settled rather creatively in India.

- TRACING THE ORIGINS OF FUNDAMENTALISM

The term "fundamentalism" originated from a set of four-volume books published in 1909 titled "The Fundamentals". Published by the Bible Institute of Los Angeles (now the Biola University) between 1909 and 1920, these books called upon Christians to affirm certain fundamental doctrines in Christianity. This sparked the “Fundamentalist Modernist controversy” in the late 19th century within the Protestant churches of the United States, which continued through the 1920s.

Fundamentalism soon became associated with a specific segment of evangelical Protestantism, who separated themselves from modernity and other Christians who disagreed with their views. It would also apply to other religious groups, both within and outside Christianity, who would adhere strictly to certain beliefs while completely disregarding others.

- THE RATIONALE BEHIND FUNDAMENTALISM

Fundamentalism is primarily associated with religious beliefs. Most forms of religious fundamentalism share similar traits. Religious fundamentalists believe that their sacred books and scriptures are the literal word of God. As they view these scriptures as infallible, fundamentalists believe that no one has the right to alter them or disagree with them.

Fundamentalists often feel that their way of life and cherished truths are under attack by the forces of secularism and liberalism. They believe that their cause has cosmic significance. They see themselves as protectors of a distinctive doctrine and a way of life. This sense of community, centered on a clearly defined religious way of life, is the promise of fundamentalist movements.

- TYPES OF FUNDAMENTALISM

Fundamentalism can be categorized into two types:

1. Religious Fundamentalism

2. Non-religious Fundamentalism.

- A. Religious fundamentalism can further be divided into:

- Christian Fundamentalism
- Islamic Fundamentalism
- Buddhist Fundamentalism
- Sikh and Hindu Fundamentalism
- Jewish Fundamentalism

B. Non-religious fundamentalism

It's worth noting that fundamentalism is not limited to religious beliefs. Any intolerant philosophy, which perceives itself as the ultimate truth, can be considered fundamentalism. For instance, when Albania declared itself an “atheist state” under communist rule during the Cold War, it was perceived by many as a form of “fundamentalist atheism”. In France, the imposition of restrictions on the public display of religion has been labeled by some as “secular fundamentalism.” The concept of fundamentalism is about the idea of purity and is self-imposed rather than a counter-culture principle.

- FEATURES OF FUNDAMENTALISM.

1. Literal interpretation of texts (religious or ideological)
2. Rejection of modernity, pluralism, and secularism
3. Gender regressive beliefs
4. Often anti-intellectual and anti-science
5. Seeks moral uniformity through coercion or law
6. Uses violence or threats to enforce beliefs

- EXAMPLES OF FUNDAMENTALISM IN INDIA

1. Religious: Hindutva mobilization, Islamic fundamentalist groups
2. Ethnic: ULFA in Assam, Khalistani revivalism
3. Linguistic: Anti-Hindi agitations, linguistic pride movements
4. Cultural: Moral policing by vigilante groups, bans on art or literature

- CAUSES OF RISE IN FUNDAMENTALISM

1. Crisis of modernity and alienation

2. Globalization and cultural invasion anxieties
3. Identity politics in multi-ethnic societies
4. Perceived threat to tradition or religion
5. Political patronage and vote-bank politics
6. Educational gaps and lack of critical thinking
7. Media polarization and misinformation

- SOCIOLOGICAL ANALYSIS

1. Durkheim and Collective Consciousness: According to Emile Durkheim, religion is a source of collective conscience. However, when societies undergo rapid change, this shared morality may become rigid. Fundamentalism arises when people cling to religion to regain a lost sense of order and moral community.
2. Weber and Religious Authority: Max Weber's concept of charismatic authority helps explain how fundamentalist leaders gain followers by portraying themselves as divinely guided. Such leaders often emerge during times of social disruption, offering certainty and purpose to anxious populations.
3. Religion as Ideology: Marx viewed religion as the “opium of the people”—a tool used by ruling classes to suppress dissent. Fundamentalism, in this lens, serves reactionary class interests, preventing the poor from challenging their material exploitation by focusing on religious salvation.
4. Cultural Hegemony: Antonio Gramsci's idea of cultural hegemony shows how dominant ideologies, like fundamentalism, maintain power by shaping the moral and intellectual life of a society. In India, right-wing cultural nationalism has tried to define patriotism in religious terms, marginalizing dissent.
5. Identity Politics: In an age of globalization, Manuel Castells argues that people seek identity in closed groups—be it religion, caste, or region. Fundamentalism offers a sense of belonging in a rapidly changing world where traditional values feel threatened.
6. Soft State: Gunnar Myrdal's idea of a “soft state” explains how India's weak enforcement of secular principles allows religious extremists to operate with impunity. The lack of consistent state action fuels the growth of parallel moralities and vigilante groups.

7. Clash of Civilizations: Samuel Huntington predicted that post-Cold War conflicts would be driven by civilizational identities, especially religion. The global rise in Islamic and Christian fundamentalism and India's own communal tensions reflect this shift from ideological to cultural conflict.
8. Symbolic Power: Pierre Bourdieu's idea of symbolic capital shows how religious symbols and rituals are politicized. For example, wearing specific clothing, chanting slogans, or temple visits become markers of loyalty, and those who differ are labeled anti-national or unfaithful.

- IMPLICATIONS OF FUNDAMENTALISM

1. Threat to Democracy: Fundamentalism undermines pluralism, suppresses dissent, and fuels majoritarianism, weakening democratic institutions.
2. Gender Repression: It often promotes patriarchal values and curbs women's rights, from education to mobility and reproductive freedom.
3. Rise in Violence and Polarization: Hate crimes, mob lynchings, and riots become tools to impose moral or religious dominance.
4. Collapse of Secular Ethos: Fundamentalism erodes the constitutional ideal of secularism, replacing civic identity with religious identity.
5. Hindrance to Education and Science: It opposes rational thought, promoting dogma and often pressuring educational institutions to revise textbooks or syllabi based on faith-based narratives.

- POLICY RECOMMENDATIONS AND WAY FORWARD

1. Strengthen secular education that fosters critical thinking and constitutional values.
2. De-link religion from politics through strict implementation of electoral laws.
3. Promote inter-faith dialogue and community-based peacebuilding.

4. Empower civil society to resist hate speech and religious dogma.
5. Reform religious institutions to promote inclusivity, especially for women and minorities.
6. Utilize media literacy programs to counter radical narratives online.

- FUNDAMENTALISM VS COMMUNALISM: THE DIFFERENCE

The terms 'Fundamentalism' and 'Communalism' are often used interchangeably, but there are subtle differences between them:

While communalism is about the political or economic interests of a particular community, fundamentalism is about enforcing sectarianism rigidly for the political mobilization of a community for the power-goals of its elite.

Communalism is about exploiting the sentiments of a religion-based community for a secular goal, while fundamentalism is about enforcing narrow sectarian practices for strengthening religious orthodoxy and achieving political power.

Fundamentalism and communalism, while often intertwined, differ in their core nature and objectives. Fundamentalism is primarily ideological, rooted in rigid adherence to religious or doctrinal principles, often rejecting modernity and pluralism. It seeks to impose a singular moral or religious worldview. In contrast, communalism is political and identity-based, where religion or ethnicity is used as a tool to mobilize communities for political gain, often resulting in intergroup hostility. While fundamentalism fuels the belief system, communalism exploits it for electoral or territorial power, making it a more strategic and conflict-prone phenomenon in plural societies like India.

Thus, there is a thin line that differentiates fundamentalism from communalism. However, in today's context, both are political instruments and attempt to mobilize people on religious grounds.

14.3 COMMUNALISM

The rising trend of communalism and the accompanying violence have created a feeling of insecurity among the religious minorities. Muslims, Sikhs and Christians in particular, fear discrimination and confrontation in the days to come. This may just be a fear, but the nation cannot afford to let about one-fifth of the country's population to fall victim to panic suspicion and insecurity. The events between 1984 and

1999 in Kashmir, Punjab, Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, Gujarat, Assam, Orissa, Andhra Pradesh and Delhi give ample evidence and taste of the destructive outcome of the communal virus in its varied forms. Religious minorities in India are protected by the Constitution which provides for justice, tolerance, equality and freedom. But in an age in which religious fundamentalism is getting transferred into religious bigotry, intolerance and narrow-mindedness, the notion of 'Ram Rajya', is not infrequently misinterpreted by the minorities, especially Muslims, to mean the rule of Lord Ram i.e. Hindu rule. The presence of police in and near religious shrines to keep an eye on and check the hide-outs of terrorists (as in Amritsar in 1985 and in Kashmir in November 1993 and May 1995) is viewed as interference in religious faith. Therefore, to prevent damage to the peace and integrity of the nation, there is need to analyse and debate the problem of communalism and communal violence. It has become absolutely important to define 'communalism'. Also, it is equally pertinent to discover who is 'communal.'

• Concept of Communalism

Communalism is an ideology, which states that society is divided into religious communities whose interests differ and are at times even opposed to each other. The antagonism practiced by the people of one community against the people of other community and religion can be termed 'communalism'. This antagonism goes to the extent of falsely accusing, harming and deliberately insulting a particular community and extends to looting, burning down the homes and shops of the helpless and the weak, dishonoring women, and even killing persons. 'Communal persons' are those who practice politics through religion. Among leaders, those religious leaders are 'communal' who run their religious communities like business enterprises and institutions and raise the cries of "Hinduism, Islam, Sikhism or Christianity in danger", the moment they find that donations into their holy 'corporations' have begun to dwindle, or their leadership has come to be challenged, or their ideology has been questioned. Thus, 'communal' is not one who is a man of religion but one who practices politics by linking it with religion. These power politicians are not good Hindus nor Good Muslims, Sikhs, Christians, Parsis or Buddhists. They can be viewed as dangerous political 'scum.' For them, God and religion are merely instruments to be used to live luxuriously as the 'king parasites' of society and to attain political goals (Day After, June, 1990:35-36).

T.K. Oommen (1989) has suggested six dimensions of communalism: assimilationist, welfarist, retreatist, retaliatory, separatist, and secessionist. Assimilationist communalism is one in which small religious groups are assimilated / integrated into a big religious group. Such communalism claims that Scheduled Tribes are Hindus, or that Jains, Sikhs and Buddhists are Hindus and they should be covered by the Hindu Marriage Act. Welfarist communalism aims at the welfare of a particular community say, improving living standard and providing for education and health of Christians by the Christian associations, or Parsi associations working for the uplift of the Parsis. Such communal mobilization aims at working only for members of one's own community. Retreatist communalism is one in which a small religious community keeps itself away from politics: for example, Bahai community, which forbids its members from participating in political activities. Retaliatory communalism attempts to harm, hurt, and injure the members of other religious communities. Separatist communalism is one in which one religious or a cultural group; wants to maintain its cultural specificity and demands a separate territorial state within the country, for example, the demand of Mizos and Nagas in North-East India or Bodos in Assam, or of Jhakhand tribals in Bihar, or of Gorkhas for Gorakhaland in West Bengal, or of hill people for Uttrakhand in Uttar Pradesh, or of Vidharbha in Maharashtra. Lastly, secessionist communalism is one in which a religious community wants a separate political identity and demands an independent state. A very small militant section of Sikh population demanding Khalistan or some Muslim militants demanding independent Kashmir were engaged in practicing this type of communalism. Of these six types of communalism, the last three create problems engendering agitation, communal riots, terrorism and insurgency.

- Communalism in India

The pluralist society of India is composed of many religious groups; however, these groups are further divided into various sub-groups. Hindus are divided into sects like Arya Samajis, Shrivites, Sanatanees, and Vaishnavas while Muslims are divided into Shias and Sunnis on the one hand, and Ashrafs (aristocrats), Azlafs (weavers, butchers, carpenters, oilmen), and Arzals on the other. Strained relations between Hindus and Muslims have existed for a long time, whereas some Hindus and Sikhs have started viewing each other with suspicion only during the last fifteen years or so. Although in a few states, we now hear of some conflicts between Hindus and Christians and Muslims and Christians too, yet, by and large, Christians in India do not feel deprived or exploited by other communities. Among Muslims Shias and Sunnis too are prejudicial attitudes towards each other. Here, we will mainly analyse Hindu-Muslim and briefly Hindu-Sikh relations.

- Hindu-Muslim Communalism

Muslim attacks on India started in the tenth century, but early Muslim conquerors were more interested in looting rather than establishing religious dominance. It was when Qutubdin became the first Sultan of Delhi that Islam found a footing in India. Later, it was the Moghuls who consolidated their empire and Islam in the process. Some of the policies proselytisation efforts, destruction of Hindu temples and construction of mosques over these temples by Moghul rulers aroused communal bickering between Hindu and Muslim communities. When the British established their dominance in India, they initially adopted the policy of patronizing Hindus, but after the First War of Independence in 1857 in which Hindus and Muslims fought shoulder to shoulder, the Britishers adopted the policy of 'divide and rule' which resulted in deliberately fostering communal clashes deliberately for keeping their hegemony intact. The relations between Hindus and Muslims were further strained when during the freedom struggle, power politics came into play. Thus, though antagonism between Hindus and Muslims is an old issue, Hindu-Muslim communalism in India can be described a legacy of the British rule during the freedom struggle. This communalism operates today in a significantly changed social and political milieu. It is the single largest threat to the secular ideals that are enshrined in our constitution.

Let us examine the genesis and historical roots of Hindu-Muslim communalism after the First World War in order to provide some understanding of this phenomenon in its contemporary context. What were the religious and political ideologies and aspirations of the political parties that participated in the freedom struggle? The nationalist appeal was to address itself to two important factors to unite the diverse groups: first, freedom from the exploitation of colonial rulers, and second, democratic rights for all citizens. But the major political parties such as the Congress, the Muslim League, the Communist Party and the Hindu Maha Sabha did not share these sentiments in the thirties and forties of the twentieth century. The Congress from its very inception adopted a policy of 'unity from the top' in which the effort was to win over the middle-class and upper-class muslims who were accepted as leaders of the Muslim community, leaving it to them to draw the Muslim masses into the movement. This 'unity from the top' approach could not promote Hindu-Muslim cooperation in fighting imperialism. All serious efforts between 1918 and 1922 at bringing about Hindu-Muslim unity were in the nature of negotiations among the top leaders of Hindu, Muslim and Sikh communities and the Congress. Quite often, the Congress acted as an intermediary among the different communal leaders instead of acting as an active organizer of the forces of secular nationalism. There was, thus, an implicit acceptance within the early nationalist leadership that Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs were distinct communities which shared only the political and the economic concerns but not the religious, social and cultural practice. This is how seeds of communalism were sown in the first and second quarters of the twentieth century. However, the Muslim League and the Hindu Maha Sabha remained fairly weak organizationally till 1936. In the 1937 elections, the Muslim League won only 22 percent of the total seats reserved for Muslims (482) in the provincial assemblies. It did not fare well even in the Muslim majority provinces. It was only after 1942 that the Muslim League emerged as a strong political party and claimed the right to speak for all Muslims; Jinnah described Congress party as a 'Hindu' organization, a claim that the British supported. Within the Congress itself, some leaders like Madan Mohan Malviya, K.M. Munshi and Sardar Patel took up pro-Hindu positions. Thus, the Congress could not purge its ranks of communal elements.

While the slogan of Pakistan was first articulated by the Muslim League in 1940, the Congress leaders accepted partition of the country in 1946 which led to displacement of millions of Hindus, Muslims and Sikhs amid bloodshed and carnage. Even after the partition, the Congress failed to come to grips with communalism. It could, thus, be said that Hindu-Muslim communalism in India had politico-social origins and religion alone was not the cause of the conflict between Hindus and Muslims, Economic interest and the cultural and social mores (such as festivals, social practices and lifestyle) were factors that further divided the two communities.

Sixteen cities in India have been identified as more vulnerable to Hindu-Muslim communal riots. Of these, five (Moradabad, Meerut, Aligarh, Agra and Varnasi) are in Uttar Pradesh; one (Aurangabad) in Maharashtra; one (Ahmedabad) in Gujarat; one (Hyderabad) in Andhra Pradesh, two (Jamshedpur and Patna) in Bihar, two (Silchar and Gauhati) in Assam, one (Calcutta) in West Bengal; one (Bhopal) in Madhya Pradesh; one (Srinagar) in Jammu and Kashmir; and one (Cuttack) in Orissa. Since eleven cities lie in the northern belt, three in the eastern belt, and two in the southern belt, could it be presumed that the Muslims in South India are culturally better assimilated because of their involvement in trade and commerce, which calls for goodwill withal communities? Strangely, this fact applies to the five cities in U.P. also. We have therefore, to search another explanation for this phenomenon.

The Hindu-Muslim antagonism can be ascribed to a complex set of factors: These are: (1) Muslim invasions in which the invader looted property and constructed mosques over/near Hindu temples, (2) British encouragement of Muslim separatism for their own ends during their imperial rule, (3) The behaviour of some of the Muslims in India after partition, indicating their pro-Pakistan attitude. Such behaviour creates a feeling among the majority community that Muslims are not patriotic. The stereotype image of an Indian Muslims which is entrenched in the Hindu psyche is that of a bigoted, inward-looking outcaste. A Muslim similarly looks upon a Hindu as a conniving, all-powerful opportunist and he views himself as victimized by him and alienated from the mainstream of society, (4) A new aggressiveness on the part of the Muslim political parties in an effort to find a place in the country. Reports are rife about some Muslim xtremists obtaining 'foreign money', turning into foreign agents, indulging in a well-designed plan to soil the secular ideal of the country, and attempting to incite Indian Muslims and resolve their problems is perhaps due to frustration because they have been influenced by the wave of Islamic fundamentalism sweeping West Asia and Pakistan. The leaders have only exploited the numerical strength of the Muslims (especially in Kerala, Kashmir and Uttar Pradesh) to strike barter deals, secure a chunk of Muslim seats in parliament and legislatures and seek power and pelf for themselves and their friends. (6) The government is also responsible for neglecting Muslims, large sections of whom feel alienated and consequently become willing victims of selfish leaders. The ruling elite merely preaches religious amity and has little understanding of the real problems of the Muslims. The Hindu leadership only deals with those Muslim leaders who toe their line.

The Indian Muslims, not surprisingly, tend to consider their future as a question of 'Us' versus 'They'. When they make their demands known, as any segment of society would do to voice their grievances, it more often than not explodes into an orgy of Hindu-Muslim violence which leads to the accusation of foreign incitement. Should the Muslim problem be perceived only as a communal problem? Is it not a fact that the Hindu-Muslim issue is not any different from the anti-Brahmin agitations in Tamil Nadu, or the intercaste conflicts in Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and some other states, or the Bengal-Assames trouble in Assam, or the Maharashtrian-non-Maharashtrian conflict in Maharashtra? The problem in reality is one of social and economic interest and rigidity and change in values.

The militant Hindus maintain that Muslims in the country are being pampered. The Ramjanam Bhoomi-Babri Masjid issue in 1992-93 further affected the delicate balance of communal harmony. After getting disillusioned with the Congress, Muslims developed faith in the Janata Dal (1990) in the Samajwadi Party (1995), in the Bahujan Sama Party, and in the United Front (1996). The break-up of the Janata Dal (November 1990) followed by the assassination of Rajiv Gandhi (May 1991), coming to power of Bharatiya Janata Party in November 1993 elections in four states (Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh, Madhya Pradesh and Himachal Pradesh), and at the Centre in 1998, and Janata Dal in Karnataka and Telgu Desham in Andhra Pradesh in 1994 elections, and Shiva Sena and BJP in Maharashtra and BJP in Gujarat in March 1995 elections, break down of coalition Ministry of SP and BSP and of BJP and BSP in Uttar Pradesh, failure of SP and BSP to get majority in Uttar Pradesh elections in October, 1996, and failure of Samajwadi Party to support Sonia Gandhi in forming Ministry at the Centre after Vajpayee's defeat in Parliament in April 1999—all these have created confusion. The Muslims today feel far more concerned about their safety and security than before.

• Hindu-Sikh Communalism

The Sikhs constitute less than 2 percent of India's population. Though dispersed widely over the entire country and even abroad, their largest concentration is in Punjab, where they form the majority of the state's population.

The Sikh agitation started in Punjab in the early eighties. The number of killings increased and the Sikh protests became organized, militant and increasingly violent. In 1984, when the military launched Operation Blue Star for seizing weapons and arresting militants from the Golden Temple at Amritsar, the Sikhs reacted violently. In October 1984 when Indira Gandhi was assassinated and thousands of Sikhs were killed in Delhi and other states, and their property was looted, burnt or destroyed some Sikh militants became so agitated that they killed hundreds of Hindus in trains and buses, destroyed their property and forced many Hindus to leave Punjab. In May 1988, when operation Black Thunder was launched once again by the military to clear militants from the Golden Temple in Amritsar which remained under their control for about ten days, the Sikhs retaliated by exploding bombs, killing Hindus and looting banks. The relations between Sikhs and Hindus thus remained strained for about one and half decade. However, the militancy of extremist Sikhs in Punjab has now been suppressed and from 1993 onwards, there has been considerable improvement in the relations between the people of the two communities. There are goodwill and respect

14.4 Ethnic Violence

Besides the Hindu-Muslim conflicts and Hindu-Sikh skirmishes, how do we perceive relations between different ethnic groups, say between the Assamese and the non-Assamese? In Assam, for nearly 150 years the economic development of the state was fuelled by the labours and enterprise imported from outside the state. Over this period spanning a century and a half, Assam has been home to generations of the so-called 'outsider', who have known no home, no land other than the soil of Assam itself. Some have indeed grown rich, but most have remained desperately poor. The Assamese have now raised the question of nationality. The All-Assam Students Union (AASU) and the All-Assam Gana Parishad (AAGP) agitation (which fathered the AGP as a political party) confused 'outsiders' with 'foreigners' (including Bengali refugees from the Bangladesh). Fantastic figures were brandished ranging from five million to seven million as the number of foreigners (bahiragat) illegitimately lurking in the state. This issue of ridding Assam of foreigners held the state to ransom for six years—from 1979 till the Assam accord on 15 August, 1985. Hatred was stoked up against the Bodos, the Bengalis, the Marwaris and the non-Assamese Muslims. This secessionist movement was responsible for thousands of innocent deaths. The massacre of 1,383 women and children and some men in ten villages in and around Nellie in Nowgong district was a part of this ethnic violence. The AGSP which remained in power between 1985 and 1990 could not contain the ethnic tension.

The ULFA militants launched a movement which became so strong that President's rule was imposed in the state in November 1990 instead of holding elections due in January 1991. The army and the security forces launched an operation to round up rebels and recover weapons. The President's rule was, however, lifted in June 1991 when the new Congress government assumed power in the state. But the ULFA militants jolted even the new government by kidnapping some government servants including few top ONGC officials from different parts of the state on the very first day of the government's tenure. The May 1996 elections also did not prevent reprisals from the Bodos. The militants are yet to realize that Assam is like all other states in India, and it belongs to all the legitimate citizens of India, whatever language they speak, whatever religion they follow and whatever rites and rituals they practice. The Bodos—a tribe which comprised about 49 per cent of Assam's population in 1947 and about 29 per cent in 1991 and which ruled over Assam until around 1825—are now demanding autonomy. Though an accord was signed by the Assam government and the Bodo leadership represented by the All-Bodo Students Union (ABSU) and the Bodo People's Action Committee (BPAC) in February 1993 yet the problem still remains unresolved. The Bodo leaders and the state government have failed to arrive at an agreement on the boundary issue and transfer of about 3,000 villages to the Bodoland Autonomous Council. The Bodos also do not want that Assamese language should be thrust upon indigenous tribals. The Bodo movement in the 1960s, the 1970s, the 1980s and the 1990s operated in fits and starts, however, it has gathered momentum now. The Bodos now demand a Union territory called 'Udayachal'. Violent activities like bomb blasts and blowing up roads and railway bridges by the Bodo militants point out the domestic and 'foreign' and aid to the militants and the need for firm action by the government to contain insurgent activities.

- Communal Violence

Communal violence involves people belonging to two different religious communities mobilized against each other and carrying the feelings of hostility, emotional fury, exploitation, social discrimination and social neglect. The high degree of cohesion in one community against another is built around tension and polarization. The targets of attack are the members of the 'enemy' community. Generally, there is no leadership in communal riots which could effectively control and contain the riot situation. It could thus be said that communal violence is based mainly on hatred, enmity and revenge.

Communal violence has increased quantitatively and qualitatively ever since politics came to be communalized. Gandhi was its first victim followed by the murder of many persons in the 1970s and the 1980s. Following destruction of Babri structure in Ayodhya in December 1992, and bomb blasts in Bombay in early 1993, communal riots in Maharashtra Tamil Nadu, Bihar, Uttar Pradesh and Kerala have considerably increased. While some political parties tolerate ethno-religious communalism, a few others even encourage it. Recent examples of this tolerance, indifference to and passive acceptance of or even connivance of the activities of religious organizations by certain political leaders and some political parties are found in attacks on Christian missionaries and in violent activities against Christians in Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh, and Allahabad. Emergency of the mid-1970s commenced the trend of criminal elements entering mainstream politics. This phenomenon has now entrenched itself in Indian politics to such an extent that religious fanaticism, casteism and mixing of religion and politics have increased in varied dimensions. Political parties and political leaders adopt 'holier than thou' attitude in relation to each other instead of taking a collective stand against these negative impulses affecting our society.

The Hindu organizations blame Muslims and Christians for forcibly converting Hindus to their religions. Without indulging in the controversy whether proselytisation or religious conversions were coercive or voluntary, it may only be said that raising this issue today is patently irrational fanaticism. Hinduism has been tolerant and talks about all humanity being one family. Therefore, it has to be accepted that the doctrine of Hindutva blighting Indian political leaders and political parties ignore political and electoral considerations and condemn and take action against those religious organizations which disrupt peace and stability through statements and threaten the unity and pluralistic identity of India.

14.5 Features of Communal Riots

A probe of the major communal riots in the country in the last five decades has revealed that: (1)

Communal riots are more politically motivated than fuelled by religion. Even the Madan Commission which looked into communal disturbances in Maharashtra in May 1970 had emphasized that “the architects and builders of communal tensions are the communalists and a certain class of politicians—those all-India and local leaders out to seize every opportunity to strengthen their political positions, enhance their prestige and enrich their public image by giving a communal colour to every incident and thereby projecting themselves in the public eye as the champions of their religion and the rights of their community. (2) Besides political interests, economic interests too play a vigorous part in fomenting communal clashes. (3) Communal riots seem to be more common in North India than in South and East India. (4) The possibility of recurrence of communal riots in a town where communal riots have already taken place once or twice is stronger than in a town in which riots have never occurred. (5) Most communal riots take place on the occasion of religious festivals. (6) The use of deadly weapons in the riots is on the ascendancy.

14.6 Secularism

The term “Secular” means being "separate" from religion, or having no religious basis. A secular person is one who does not owe his moral values to any religion. His values are the product of his rational and scientific thinking. Secularism means separation of religion from political, economic, social and cultural aspects of life, religion being treated as a purely personal matter. It emphasized dissociation of the state from religion and full freedom to all religions and tolerance of all religions. It also stands for equal opportunities for followers of all religions, and no discrimination and partiality on grounds of religion.

- SECULARISM IN THE HISTORY OF INDIA
- Secular traditions are very deep rooted in the history of India. Indian culture is based on the blending of various spiritual traditions and social movements. In ancient India, the Santam Dharma (Hinduism) was basically allowed to develop as a holistic religion by welcoming different spiritual traditions and trying to integrate them into a common mainstream.
- The development of four Vedas and the various interpretations of the Upanishads and the Puranas clearly highlight the religious plurality of Hinduism.
- Emperor Ashoka was the first great emperor to announce, as early as third century B.C. that, the state would not prosecute any religious sect.
- In his 12th Rock Edict, Ashoka made an appeal not only for the toleration of all religion sects but also to develop a spirit of great respect toward them.

- Even after the advent of Jainism, Buddhism and later Islam and Christianity on the Indian soil, the quest for religious toleration and coexistence of different faiths continued.
- In medieval India, the Sufi and Bhakti movements bond the people of various communities together with love and peace.
- The leading lights of these movements were Khwaja Moinuddin Chisti, Baba Farid, Sant Kabir Das, Guru Nanak Dev, Saint Tukaram and Mira Bai etc.
- In medieval India, religious toleration and freedom of worship marked the State under Akbar. He had a number of Hindus as his ministers, forbade forcible conversions and abolished Jizya.
- The most prominent evidence of his tolerance policy was his promulgation of ‘Din-i-Ilahi’ or the Divine Faith, which had elements of both Hindu and Muslim faith.
- That this was not imposed upon the subjects is obvious from the fact that there were few adherents to it. Along with this he emphasized the concept of ‘sulh-i-kul’ or peace and harmony among religions.
- He even sponsored a series of religious debates which were held in the ‘Ibadat Khana’ of the Hall of Worship, and the participants in these debates included theologians from amongst Brahmins, Jains and Zoroastrians.
- Even before Akbar, Babar had advised Humayun to “shed religious prejudice, protect temples, preserve cows, and administer justice properly in this tradition.”
- The spirit of secularism was strengthened and enriched through the Indian freedom movement too, though the British have pursued the policy of divide and rule.
- In accordance with this policy, the British partitioned Bengal in 1905. Separate electorates were provided for Muslims through the Indian Councils Act of 1909, a provision which was extended to Sikhs, Indian Christians, Europeans and Anglo-Indians in certain provinces by the Government of India Act, 1919.
- Ramsay MacDonald Communal Award of 1932, provided for separate electorates as well as reservation of seats for minorities, even for the depressed classes became the basis for representation under the Government of India Act, 1935.

- However, Indian freedom movement was characterized by secular tradition and ethos right from the start. In the initial part of the Indian freedom movement, the liberals like Sir Feroz Shah Mehta, Govind Ranade, Gopal Krishna Gokhale by and large pursued a secular approach to politics.
- The constitution drafted by Pandit Moti Lal Nehru as the chairman of the historic Nehru Committee in 1928, had many provision on secularism as: 'There shall be no state religion for the commonwealth of India or for any province in the commonwealth, nor shall the state, either directly or indirectly, endow any religion any preference or impose any disability on account of religious beliefs or religious status'.
- Gandhiji's secularism was based on a commitment to the brotherhood of religious communities based on their respect for and pursuit of truth, whereas, J. L. Nehru's secularism was based on a commitment to scientific humanism tinged with a progressive view of historical change.
- At present scenario, in the context of Indian, the separation of religion from the state constitutes the core of the philosophy of secularism.

- PHILOSOPHY OF INDIAN SECULARISM

The term 'secularism' is akin to the Vedic concept of 'Dharma nirapekshata' i.e. the indifference of state to religion. This model of secularism is adopted by western societies where the government is totally separate from religion (i.e. separation of church and state). Indian philosophy of secularism is related to "Sarva Dharma Sambhava" (literally it means that destination of the paths followed by all religions is the same, though the paths themselves may be different) which means equal respect to all religions. This concept, embraced and promoted by personalities like Vivekananda and Mahatma Gandhi is called 'Positive secularism' that reflects the dominant ethos of Indian culture.

India does not have an official state religion. However, different personal laws - on matters such as marriage, divorce, inheritance, alimony varies with an individual's religion. Indian secularism is not an end in itself but a means to address religious plurality and sought to achieve peaceful coexistence of different religions.

- SECULARISM AND THE INDIAN CONSTITUTION

- There is a clear incorporation of all the basic principles of secularism into various provisions of constitution. The term ‘Secular’ was added to the preamble by the forty-second constitution Amendment Act of 1976, (India is a sovereign, socialist, secular, democratic, republic).

- It emphasises the fact that constitutionally, India is a secular country which has no State religion. And that the state shall recognise and accept all religions, not favour or patronize any particular religion.
- While Article 14 grants equality before the law and equal protection of the laws to all, Article 15 enlarges the concept of secularism to the widest possible extent by prohibiting discrimination on grounds of religion, race, caste, sex or place of birth.
- Article 16 (1) guarantees equality of opportunity to all citizens in matters of public employment and reiterates that there would be no discrimination on the basis of religion, race, caste, sex, descent, place of birth and residence.
- Article 25 provides ‘Freedom of Conscience’, that is, all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right to freely profess, practise and propagate religion.
- As per Article 26, every religious group or individual has the right to establish and maintain institutions for religious and charitable purposes and to manage its own affairs in matters of religion.
- As per Article 27, the state shall not compel any citizen to pay any taxes for the promotion or maintenance of any particular religion or religious institution.
- Article 28 allows educational institutions maintained by different religious groups to impart religious instruction.
- Article 29 and Article 30 provides cultural and educational rights to the minorities.
- Article 51A i.e. Fundamental Duties obliges all the citizens to promote harmony and the spirit of common brotherhood and to value and preserve the rich heritage of our composite culture.

- INDIAN VS. WESTERN MODEL OF SECULARISM

- Over the years, India has developed its own unique concept of secularism that is fundamentally different from the parallel western concept of secularism in the following ways:
- As per the western model of secularism, the “State” and the “religion” have their own separate spheres and neither the state nor the religion shall intervene in each other's affairs. Thus, the western concept of secularism requires complete separation of religion and state. However, in India, neither in law nor in practice any 'wall of separation' between religion and the State exists.

- In India, both state and religion can, and often do, interact and intervene in each other's affairs within the legally prescribed and judicially settled parameters. In other words, Indian secularism does not require a total banishment of religion from the State affairs. As per the western model, the state cannot give any financial support to educational institutions run by religious communities.
- On the other hand, Indian model has chosen a positive mode of engagement. In India, the state provides all religious minorities the right to establish and maintain their own educational institutions which may receive assistance from state. In the western model, State does not intervene in the affairs of religion till the time religion is working within the limits of the law.
- On the other hand, in Indian secularism, state shall interfere in religion so as to remove evils in it. India has intervened by enforcing legislation against the practices of sati or widow-burning, dowry, animal and bird sacrifice, child marriage, and preventing Dalits from entering temples. In western concept of secularism, religion is relegated entirely to the private sphere and has no place in public life whatsoever.
- The western model prohibits any public policy to be drafted on the basis of religion therefore; state is absolutely distanced from the religious activities and practices of its citizens. In India, state has the policy of setting up Departments of Religious Endowments, Wakf Boards, etc. It is also involved in appointing Trustees of these boards.

- THREATS TO SECULARISM
- While, the Indian Constitution declares the state being absolutely neutral to all religion, our society has steeped in religion.
- Mingling of Religion and Politics that is mobilisation of votes on grounds of primordial identities like religion, caste and ethnicity, have put Indian secularism in danger.
- Communal politics operates through communalization of social space, by spreading myths and stereotypes against minorities, through attack on rational values and by practicing a divisive ideological propaganda and politics.

- Politicisation of any one religious group leads to the competitive politicisation of other groups, thereby resulting in inter-religious conflict.
- One of the manifestations of communalism is communal riots. In recent past also, communalism has proved to be a great threat to the secular fabric of Indian polity.
- Rise of Hindu Nationalism in recent years have resulted into mob lynching on mere suspicion of slaughtering cows and consuming beef.
- In addition, with this, forced closure of slaughterhouses, campaigns against ‘love jihad’, reconversion or ghar- wapsi (Muslims being forced to convert to Hinduism), etc. reinforces communal tendencies in society.
- Islamic fundamentalism or revivalism pushes for establishing Islamic State based on sharia law which directly comes into conflict with conceptions of the secular and democratic state.
- In recent years there have been stray incidences of Muslim youth being inspired and radicalized by groups like ISIS which is very unfortunate for both India and world.

- WAY FORWARD

- In a pluralistic society, the best approach to nurture secularism is to expand religious freedom rather than strictly practicing state neutrality.
- It is incumbent on us to ensure value-education that makes the younger generation understands and appreciates not only its own religious traditions but also those of the other religions in the country.
- There is also a need to identify a common framework or a shared set of values which allows the diverse groups to live together.
- The prerequisites to implement the social reform initiative like Uniform Civil Code are to create a conducive environment and forging socio-political consensus.

14.7 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude, Charles Glock argues that researchers have been unable to measure the significance of religion because 'they have not given adequate attention to conceptualizing religion or religiousness in a comprehensive way'. Until they have clearly thought out and stated exactly what they mean by religion and religiousness. Glock maintains that the secularization thesis cannot be adequately tested. In an attempt to solve this problem, Glock and Stark define five 'core dimension of religiousness'. First the belief dimension is the degree to which people hold religious belief. Second the religious practice is the degree to which people engage in acts or worship and devotion. Third the experience dimension is the degree to which people feel and experience contact and communication with the supernatural. Fourth, the knowledge dimension - the amount of knowledge people have of their religion. Fifth, the consequences dimension - the degree to which the previous dimensions affect people's day-to-day lives, Glock and Stark argue that a clearly defined system in which to classify people in religious terms is necessary before any scientifically valid statement about religiousness can be made. Only when different researchers use the same conceptualization of religion can their results be compared with any degree of validity.

Even though Glock and Stark's scheme may represent an improvement on previous research degrees, it does not solve a basic problem of research methodology. It is unhitched that any research technique will be developed to accurately measure subjective factors such as the strength of religious commitment takenover with any degree of certainty, the meanings and motives which he behind social action.

15.0 Objectives

The main objectives of this lesson are to equip you with

- Religio-Reform Movements
- Socio-Religious Movements among Muslims.
- Other Muslim Reform Movements

15.1 Introduction

Religion is not sterile. It brings forth social change. Functionalists have always been talking about religion as a vehicle of social transformation. In Europe there have been several religious movements. Catholicism has motivated a large number of upheavals in Europe and America. Historians have recorded specific period for social reform. Calvin, Martin Luther King and other have headed several reform movements. In India also there were social religious movements for the change of religion. Bengal has been a cradle of religious movements. In Punjab and Haryana there was Dayanand Saraswati who rejected the caste system; in Maharashtra Jyoti Ba Phule worked against caste system and Ambedkar himself work as a social reformist. All the movements show the dynamic aspect of religion. It must not be forgotten that from Marxian point of view religion comes in the way of social change. There is an anecdote that there was a famine in USSR. Some charitable institutions distributed woolen shawls to the poor people. It was reported to Lenin who responded on it : "Stop this charity immediately. It will take the revolutions steam from the poor people. Let them suffer to the extreme. And, people would be ready for committing revolution."

Socio-religious movements in India can be understood with reference to India's nationalism. In the premodern colonial India, the Britishers also wanted to bring some reforms in Indian society so that they could establish themselves. The Britishers brought about some reforms. During Mughal period also Akbar wanted to establish himself as a reformist leader. This country has a history of multi-pluralities. In such a society some reforms were essential to bring about social unity and cohesion. There were about 3000 castes which had to be brought together to bring an empire. Akbar's effort for Din-E-Elahi was nothing but an effort for socio-religious reform.

A.R. Desai in his powerful book on the Social Background of Indian Nationalism (1948), argues that the religious reform movements in India very amply show the expression of national awakening. He observes:

The national democratic awakening of the Indian people found expression also in the religious sphere. The contradiction between the old religious outlook, practices, and organization, on the one hand, and the new social and economic reality on the other, gave rise to various religio-reform movements in the country. These movements represented attempts to revise the old religion in the spirit of the new principles of nationalism and democracy, which were the conditions for the development of the new society.

The spirit of nationalism was needed to unite the people into a joint effort to solve problems, which had become national due to the political and economic unification of the Indian people, for the first time in their history, under the British rule. To advance the economic and cultural evolution of the Indian society, now become a single whole, as also to combat restrictions which the British rule put on this evolution, constituted the principal task set to itself by the rising Indian nationalism. It is true that the early pioneers of Indian nationalism, the early social and religious reformers, had hopes of getting these restrictions removed under the guidance of British Democracy. Still, they did recognize that the British rule, in spite of its early progressive character, handicapped the Indian national development.

Democracy was another principle which the reformers, the early pioneer nationalists like Ram Mohan Roy, Debendra Nath Tagore, Keshubchandra Sen, Telang, Ranade, Fulley, and the founders of the Arya Samaj, in varying degrees extended to the sphere of religion. Modern society established in India by the British conquest was a capitalist society resting on the principles of individual liberty, freedom of competition, contrast, and freedom of the individual to own and manipulate property at will. Individualism was its keynote in contrast to the pre-capitalist society which was authoritarian in character; maintained social distinctions based on birth and sex, and subordinated the individual to caste and the joint family system. The new society demanded, as the very condition of its development, the abolition of privileges based on birth or sex. The early religious reformers strove to extend the principle of individual liberty to the sphere of religion. In fact, these religio-reform movements, the Brahmo Samaj, the Prarthana Samaj, the Arya Samaj and others, were in different degrees endeavors to recast the old religion into a new form suited to meet the needs of the new society. It is true that some of their leaders (especially of the Arya Samaj) had the misconception that they were reviving the old pristine social structure of the Vedic Aryans that they were returning to the Golden Age. In reality they were engaged, in varying degrees, in adapting the Hindu religion to the social, political, economic and cultural needs of the contemporary Indian nation. History records instances where the consolidators of new societies were imaging that they were returning to the past 'and reviving the best social forms existing in the old periods. In fact, the early religio-reform movements in India were attempting to build a religious outlook which would build up national unity of all communities, the Hindus, the Muslims, the Parsis and the rest, for solving such common national tasks as the economic development of India on modern lines, the removal of restrictions put on the people's free evolution, the establishment of equality between man and woman, the abolition of caste, the abolition of the Brahmin as the monopolist of classical culture and sole intermediary between God and the individual. Nevertheless, like the leaders of the European Protestant and other movements comprising the Religious Reformation, the Indian religious reformers were not rehabilitating any past period of society but only consolidating the rising new society.

15.2 Religio-Reform Movements

Before the attainment of Independence there were religio-reform movements but they were characterized for the rule of the aristocracy. Liberalism, the philosophy of capitalism preached democracy and government by the people. Medievalism including medieval religion stood for privilege based on birth. Liberalism attacked all such privilege as unjust and proclaimed the principles of individual liberty, equal right and pre-competition. Medievalism demanded faith from the people in the divine origin of kingship, in the sacrosanct character of the social structure, and in the God-ordained nature of whatever exists. Liberalism substituted critical religion for faith. Every institution and principle must be subjected to the test of reason.

Sometimes old gods and goddesses were interpreted in a way suitable for rousing national sentiments and hopes among the people. This interpretation of the old images of gods and goddesses has imparted a new meaning to the current ceremonialism of the country, and multitudes, while worshipping either Jagat Dhatri or Kali or Durga, accost them with devotion... with the inspiring cry of "Bande Mataram." All these are the popular objects of worship of the Indian Hindus and the transfiguration of these symbols is at once the cause and the evidence of the depth and strength of the present movement. This wonderful transfiguration of the old gods and goddesses is carrying the message of new nationalism to the women and masses of the country.

Thus, the religio-revival movement, too, like the religio-reform movement, was inspired with a national ideal.

Other characteristics of the religio-reform movements was that their programme was not restricted to the task of merely reforming religion but extended to that of the reconstruction of social institutions and social relations. This was due to the fact that in India religion and social structure were organically interwoven. Caste hierarchy, sex inequality, unsociability and social taboos, flourished because of the sanction of religion. Social reform, consequently, constituted a part of the platform of all religio-reform movements. While rationalizing religion to a greater or less degree, these movements also aimed at rationalizing social institutions and relations to a greater or less degree. Nowhere in the world did religion dominate and determine the life of the individual as in India. His economic activity his social life, his marriage, birth, and death, his physical movements, all were strictly and minutely controlled by religion. It was indispensable for the religio-reform movements to have an all-embracing programme of religious, social and even political reform. They fought the caste system and Theban ongoing to a foreign country as much as polytheism and idolatry. They attacked caste privilege, as much as the monopoly rights of the Brahmin in the sphere of religion. They attacked all this because they were obstacles to national progress which required, as its vital pre-conditions, national unity based on the principles of equality and liberty of individuals and groups.

The motive of the movements was national advance. The first national awakening of the Indian people

15.3 Brahmo Samaj Movement

The Brahmo Samaj, established in 1828 by Raja Ram Mohan Roy (1772- 1833), who can be correctly described as the Father of Indian Nationalism, was the first movement of this kind. The Raja was essentially a democrat and a humanist. In his religio-philosophical and social outlook, he was deeply influenced by monotheism and anti-idolatry of Islam, Deism of Sufism, the ethical teachings of Christianity and the liberal and rationalist doctrines of the west. He tried to interpret and assimilate into himself the highest elements of Islam, Christianity, and modern Rationalism or Humanism, and transformed them into a single creed which he found in the ancient Upanishadic philosophy of his own community.

He attacked the polytheistic degeneration of ancient Hindu monotheism. He attacked the idol worship of the Hindus as degrading and expounded the conception of One God of the religions and humanity. His attack on polytheism and idolatry was motivated by national and social-ethical considerations as much as by philosophical conviction. 'My constant reflections on the ... injurious rites introduced by the peculiar practice of Hindu idolatry which more than any pagan-worship destroys the texture of society, together with compassion for my countrymen, have compelled me to use every possible effort to enable them to contemplate ... the unity and omnipresence of Nature's God.'

Raja Ram Mohan Roy stood for a rational approach to religion. The individual should study the scriptures directly without the priest as the intermediary and assess the rational character of a religious doctrine. He must subject religious principles to the test of his own ethical reason and reject those which contradict the test.

Since the Hindu society was dominated and governed by religious conceptions of Hinduism, no religio-reform movement could avoid a socio-reform section in its programme. According to Raja Ram Mohan Roy and early religious reformers, religious renovation was the vital condition for revising the social structure from a decadent to a healthy basis. That is why the socio-reform programme became a part of the total programme of religio-reform movements.

The Brahmo Samaj under the leadership of the Raja, launched an offensive against the caste system branding it as undemocratic, inhuman, and anti-national. It crusaded against suttee and child marriage. It stood for the freedom of the widow to remarry and equal rights of man and woman.

The Brahmo Samaj valued the modern western culture and organized educational institutions in the country for its spread among the people. Raja Ram Mohan Roy was an admirer of the liberal democratic culture of the west.

The Raja considered the British rule in India as a good thing. He admired it for inaugurating progressive measures of social reform such as the abolition of suttee and infanticide, for establishing modern educational institutions and a free press, and others.

This was natural since the British rule in India, during the first half of the nineteenth century, had historically speaking, a progressive aspect.

In spite of his great admiration for the British, Raja Ram Mohan Roy organized protest movement against the measure to restrict the freedom of the press. He also criticized the British government for excluding the Indians from higher posts.

Since the Brahmo Samaj was not merely a religious movement but also included in its programme items of social and political reform, it was the precursor of the subsequent social reform movement started by Ranade and others and the political reform movement initiated by the early Indian National Congress. The religious reform movement thus prepared for purely secular social and political reform movements in the country. That is the historical significance of Raja Ram Mohan Roy and the Brahmo Samaj he started. Raja Ram Mohan Roy inaugurated the Modern Age in India.

Debendra Nath Tagore (1817-1905) who succeeded as the leader of the Brahmo Samaj developed skepticism about the infallibility of the scriptures and finally repudiated it. He substituted intuition for the authority of the scriptures. By means of intuition he located sections of Upanishads which served as the religio-ideological basis of the doctrines and programmes of the Brahmo Samaj.

Keshab Chandra Sen (1838-84) was the next leader of the Brahmo Samaj. Under him, the doctrine of the Brahmo Samaj was more and more adapted to the doctrine of pure Christianity. In later state, he propounded the doctrine of Adesha, according to which God inspires knowledge in some individuals whose word must therefore be considered infallible and true. A section of Brahmos did not accept this doctrine, left the Samaj and started the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj.

The Brahmo Samaj was the pioneer of the nationalist movement, which by the workings of history, began as a religio-reform movement aiming at liberating the individual from the deadweight of an authoritarian religion which strangulated their initiative and stultified both the individual and collective mind.

The Brahmo Samaj inaugurate anew era for the Indian people by proclaiming the principles of individual freedom, national unity, solidarity and collaboration and the democratization of all social

15.4 Prarthana Samaj

The Prarthana Samaj was founded in 1867 in Bombay by M.G. Ranade. It had an aprogramme of religious and social reforms on the same lines as those of the Brahmo Samaj. Its founder Ranade was one of the leaders of the Indian National Congress and the Indian Social Conference, which held their first sessions in 1885 and 1888 respectively.

15.5 Arya Samaj

The Arya Samaj founded in Bombay in 1875 by Dayanand Saraswati, though embodying the first upsurge of Indian nationalism was a movement of quite a different type. It had a more revivalist character. It declared the Vedas infallible and, further an inexhaustible reservoir of all knowledge, past, present, and future. One must know how to understand and interpret the Vedas, which contain all information, philosophical, technical, and scientific. By making adequate endeavour, one can discover in the Vedas all modern chemistry, engineering and even military and non-military sciences.

Since the Vedas were proclaimed infallible, the word of the Vedas and not the judgment of the individual was the final criterion. The Arya Samaj by postulating the infallibility of the Vedas did not and could not permit the individual judgments to override.

The repudiation of the authority of the Brahmin, the denouncing of the infinite number of meaningless rites and the worship of the images of different gods and goddesses which split the people into numerous belligerent sects, and the crusade against the mass of religious superstitions which kept, for many centuries, the Hindu mind in a state of mental befogging and spiritual degradation—these were the progressive elements in the programme of the Araya Samaj. Its slogan Bark to Vedas was inspired with the urge to bring about national unity and to kindle national pride and consciousness. However, since it retained its narrow Hindu basis, the national unity it proclaimed could not gather into its fold the non-Hindu communities such as the Mohammedans and the Christians. It became a semi-rationalized form of Hinduism.

The Arya Samaj had a programme of social reform also. Though opposed to the hereditary caste system, it stood, however for the four-caste division of society to be determined by merit and not by birth. Since the Vedas laid down such a division and since the Vedas could not err, the Arya Samaj couldn't proclaim the death of the caste system itself.

The Arya Samaj stood for equal rights of man and woman in social and educational matters. This was a distinct democratic conception. It however, opposed co-education since in the Vedic period

The Arya Samaj organized a network of schools and colleges, in the country, both for boys and girls, where education was imparted in the mother tongue. The Dayanand Anglo-Vedic College was founded in 1886.

The conservative section of the Arya Samaj thought the education imparted in this college to be not sufficiently Vedic in character. Its members led by Munshi Ram, therefore, started Gurukul at Haradwar, where the education, both in content and method was given in the ancient Vedic manner.

In all its activities, the Arya Samaj was generally inspired with the spirit of nationalism and democracy. It attempted to integrate the Hindu by destroying the sub-castes. It spread education among the people, proclaimed the principle of equality irrespective of the distinctions of caste, creed, community, race, or sex. It tried to destroy their inferiority complex, the inevitable product of their status as a subject nation.

The Arya Samaj in spite of its narrow Hindu as is of its rational declaration that all knowledge is enshrined in the Vedas drew to itself hundreds of nationalist Indians. In fact, once the Arya Samaj was one of the main targets of political repression. It is hardly surprising therefore, that when Sir Valentine Chirol visited India on behalf of The Times to investigate the causes of unrest after 1907, he looked upon the Arya Samaj as a serious menace to English and sovereignty.

The Arya Samaj represented a form of the national awakening of the Indian people. Restricted to a narrow Hindu basis and with a negative attitude to Islam, it in course of time, led the Muslims to mobilize on a corresponding communal basis. It played a progressive role in the earlier stages when the national awakening was just sprouting. The Arya Samaj had two aspects, one progressive, and the other reactionary. When it attacked religious superstitions and the sacerdotal dictatorship of the Brahmin, when it denounced polytheism, and when further it adopted the programme of mass education, of the elimination of sub-castes, of the equality of man and woman, it played a progressive role. But when it declared the Vedas infallible and a treasure house of all knowledge of the cosmos past, present, and future when it stood for the division of society into four castes though based on merit, it was playing an anti-progressive role. No knowledge could ever be final in the infinite and eternally evolving social and natural world. So the Vedas could not be the embodiment of all knowledge. Further, all knowledge is historically conditioned and is limited by the level of social and economic development of the epoch in which it is born. As such, subsequent generations have to critically carry over all inherited past knowledge and subject it to the test of reason and social usefulness. Here comes the role of individual judgment. One the Vedas were eulogized as infallible, the individual as well as the generation he belonged to, were denied the right to exercise their own independent judgment and pronounce upon the ancient scriptures. This was intellectual enslavement of the individual and the generation to the scriptures. It was a departure from the principles of Liberalism.

Again, the Arya Samaj could not be a national or cosmopolitan religion since it demanded of its followers the recognition of the principle of the infallibility and the omniscience of the Vedas.

However, as mentioned above, the Arya Samaj played a progressive role in the earlier stages of Indian nationalism. However, when the national awakening broadened and deepened, when the national movement reached greater and greater secular heights, it became a hindrance to the growth of Indian nationalism by contributing though unconsciously to the creation of a belligerent religio-communal atmosphere.

15.6 Ramakrishna Mission Movement

The national awakening of the Indian people found expression in the movement inspired by Ramakrishna, a great Hindu saint, in direct line to such saints as Chandidas and Chaitanya. It primarily based itself on the principle of Devotion of Bhakti. Its principal propagandist was Swami Vivekanand, a discipline of Ramakrishna and an intellectual of a very high caliber who, after the death of the saint, founded the Ramakrishna Mission to propagate his teaching.

The Ramakrishna Mission aimed at protecting India from 'the materialist' influence of western civilization. It idealized Hinduism including its practice of idol worship and polytheism. It aimed at the spiritual conquest of the world for revived Hinduism.

One of the harmful results of the foreign rule in India has been to create a tendency among the Indians to disorient from the modern western culture, a historically higher form of culture than the pre-capitalist culture on which the conscious life of an average Indian was based.

There were other religio-reform movements of smaller magnitude, which also expressed the new awakening. Hinduism began to organize itself on a national scale in revivalist or reformist forms. These movements spread to various groups comprising Hindu society.

Thus, the Bharat Dharma Mahamandal Society having for its programmes the reforming of the Hindu religion and dissemination of religious and non-religious education among the Hindus was started in 1902. In 1890, Shri Narayan launched the movement of the Tiyas, a community which worshipped demons and formed one of the lowest castes of the Hindu society, with the programmes of building of temples and establishing schools for the community.

- Theosophy

Theosophy introduced in India by Madame Blavatsky and Henry Steel Olcott in 1879 and mainly popularized by Mrs. Annie Besant was another religio-reform movement started in India under the impact of the new Indian and international conditions. The uniqueness of this movement consisted in the fact that it was inaugurated by a non-Indian who was a great admirer of Hinduism. Theosophy subscribed to the spiritual philosophy of ancient Hinduism and recognized its doctrine of the transmigration of the soul. It preached universal brotherhood of men irrespective of distinctions of caste, creed, race or sex. It stood for the development of a national spirit among the Indians. The needs of India, Mrs. Besant wrote in 1905, are among others, the development of a national spirit, an education founded on Indian ideals and enriched not dominated by the thought and culture of the West. Theosophy stood for making a comparative study of all oriental religions. However, it considered ancient Hinduism as the most profoundly spiritual religion in the world. Theosophy, however, failed to strike deep roots in the country. There were minor religio-reform movements aiming at readjusting Hinduism to the social needs of the contemporary Indian people such as the Deva Samaj and the Radha Swami Satsang. Like their major counterparts, these movements too, aimed at integrating the Hindus round the original principles of Hinduism, democratizing social relations among them, and firing them with a national emotion. They represented in religious form the new national awakening of the Hindus.

• Religious Reforms by Eminent Political Leaders

In addition to these organized national religio-reform and religio-revivalist movements, individuals of outstanding capacity and political pre-eminence, such as Bepin Chandra Pal, Aurobindo Ghose, Tilak and Gandhi without organizing any distinct movements, contributed to the work of religious reform. Nationalism in Bengal was though becoming increasingly secular, for some time religious in character. It was influenced by the Neo-Vedantic movement of Swami Vivekanand. Hence the attempt on the part of the Bengalee Nationalists to base the movement for Swaraj on the ancient Upanishadic ideal of the search for the metaphysical Absolute in one's own innermost self. Hence, the worship of the mother—the country symbolized as the Goddess Kali.

Tilak reinterpreted the Gita and declared Action to be its central teaching. The very kernel of the Gita's philosophy, he said, was missed by the Indian people who had, as a result, sunk into inertia and fatalistic moods. The Indian nation could be roused to dynamic effort only if they recognized this.

Thus, the national movement aiming at national freedom from the British rule and the establishment of an Indian society and state on a democratic basis and on the basis also religious movement. Nationalism was expressed in religious terms and clothed in religio-mystical form. Indian nationalism with its further development however, progressively freed itself from the religious element with which it had been permeated. It became increasingly secular.

15.7 Socio-Religious Movements among Muslims

Islam across out of the democratic ferment of the common people of Arabia against the privileged strata of society as such, it has a democratic ring. Islam preaches the principle of social equality. This makes the propaganda of international socialism more successful among the Muslim rank and file.

In spite of this relative inertia of the Muslims, from the point of view of their development on nationalist lines, there sprang up, in course of time, a number of religio-revivalist and even religio-reform movements among them. These movements were however not so powerful as their counterparts among the Hindus. Besides, most of them lacked the national note. There were four such main movements started by (1) Shah Abdul Aziz of Delhi, (2) Saiyid Ahmad of Bareli, (3) Shaikh Karnamat Ali of Jaunpur and (4) Haji Shariat-ullah of Faridpur. These four movements were more of a revivalist character.

15.8 Ahmadiya Movement

The Ahmadiya Movement founded by Mirza Ghulam Ahmed in 1889 was more or less based on Liberal principles. It described itself as the standard bearer of Mohammedan Renaissance. It based itself, like the Brahmo Samaj on the principles of a universal religion of all humanity. The founder was greatly influenced by western liberalism, theosophy, and religio-reform movements of Hindus.

The Ahmadiya Movement opposed Jehad or the sacred war against non-Muslims. It stood for fraternal relations among all peoples. The movement spread western liberal education among the Indian Muslims. It started a network of schools and colleges for that purpose and published periodicals and books, both in English and vernaculars. In spite of its liberalism, the Ahmadiya Movement, like Bahaism, which flourished in the West Asiatic countries, suffered from mysticism. It however, represented an attempt on the part of Islam to assimilate the principles of western liberalism.

Due to historical causes, the Muslim community embarked on a career of national democratic progress later than the Hindus. The tragedy of the great revolt in 1857-8 marks the death of the old order, and brought political, economic and cultural disaster to the Indian Muslims. It made their sullenness, their, aloofness their suppressed hatred for the new order more marked than ever...The key to the whole situation was adaptation to the new environment, use of the new forces that had come into play, acceptance of the new instrument of progress that had been created through English education.

This recoil from the new reality could not last forever. Soon, the Muslims took to education and created an intelligentsia. They also appeared in the field of commerce and industries. The progressive elements among these new educated Muslims and Muslim merchants and industrialists steadily evolved a national outlook and took to the road of nationalism in politics and democratic reform in social matters.

15.9 Aligarh Movement

The first national awakening among the Muslims found expression in a movement, which aimed at making the Indian Muslims politically conscious and spreading modern education among them. Saiyad Ahmed Khan was the founder of this movement. He had such able collaborators as the poet Khwaja Altaf Hussain Hali, Maulvi Nazir Ahmad, and Maulvi Shibli Numani.

The liberal social reform and cultural movement founded by Sir Saiyad Ahmed Khan is known as the Aligarh Movement because it was at Aligarh that the Mohamedan Anglo-Oriental College was established in 1875. This college developed into the Aligarh University in 1890.

The Aligarh Movement aimed at spreading the western education among the Muslims without weakening their allegiance to Islam. The religious seduction reinforced the secular education, which was imparted in the educational intuitions it started. The movement aimed at evolving a distinct social and cultural community among the Indian Muslims more or less on modern lines. It condemned polygamy and the social ban on widow-remarriage which, though permitted by Islam, had crept in among some sections of the Muslims who were recent converts from Hinduism.

After the starting of the Aligarh movement, independent more or less progressive movements sprang up in Bombay, Punjab, Hyderabad, and other places.

- Sir Mahmud Iqbal

Sir Mahmud Iqbal, the poet of world celebrity, played an important role in the history of the Indian Muslims. Though he supported the Liberal movement, he asked the Muslim Liberals to be on guard so that the broad human principle which Islam stood for was not thrown in the background by emphasis on the nation and the race. Iqbal described the European civilization as inhuman, rapacious, predatory, and decadent. He even quoted such writers as Nietzsche, Schopenhauer, Spengler, and Karl Marx holding conflicting view to denounce its different aspects. He passionately attacked the European civilization in poems, which are pearls of Persian and Urdu poetry. He was essentially a humanist and considered Islam as a religion of broadest humanism. In the later phase of his life, Iqbal exhibited a reactionary tendency. He opposed democracy as a system and became hostile to the Indian nationalist movement.

15.10 Other Muslim Reform Movements

In course of time, the movement for the emancipation of the Muslim women and for combating such institutions as purdah came into existence. Tyabji an enlightened and progressive Muslim was the founder of this movement in Bombay. Shaikh Abdul Halil Sharar (1860-96), an outstanding author and journalist, organized a veritable crusade against purdah in the United Provinces.

15.11 Let us sum up

Thus, to sum up, with the spread of Liberal ideas among the Muslims, the movement to improve the social position of the Muslim women and to abolish customs which were determined to them began to gain strength. Polygamy began to diminish as also child marriage. Individual Muslims and Muslim organizations established an increasing number of educational institutions for the Muslim women all over India. Education began to spread among the Muslim women. Thus, the religio-reform and socio-reform movements grew and gathered momentum among the Muslims also. The rise of Turkish and Arab nationalism and the establishment of a national secular state in Turkey had the effect of broadening the outlook of the Indian Muslims. The rise and development of the Indian national movement also increasingly brought the Muslims into the orbit of the Indian nationalism. The independent workers and peasant's movements which developed rapidly in India later on and were mostly led by the communists, the socialists and the Left nationalists like Nehru, had the effect of making the Muslim masses national-minded and class-conscious. These movements became the training ground for the masses of both communities and spheres of collaboration to serve national and common class tasks. The economic structure and the existing foreign rule urged them to come together and co-operate for common liberation.

16.0 Objectives

After going through this lesson, you will be able to understand:

- Concept of Globalization
- Its Sociological Understanding
- Globalization and Religion

16.1 Introduction

Globalization was not simply about the rise of a global culture that all people of the world would supposedly share, rather it was more about how people increasingly formed local cultures, traditions and identities in terms of general global models. It broadly referred to the condition of complex connectivity, currently found in the world and seen in terms of both the compression of the world and the intensification of global consciousness. Some theorists held that globalization had been occurring throughout history, only its form had changed over the different historical periods. Sociologists of the classical period had identified globalizing solvents in terms of capitalist commodification (Marx), differentiation (Durkheim) and rationalization (Weber). Contemporary sociological theorists especially Robertson, Giddens and Wallerstein saw globalization largely through the mediating category of Modernity.

By the 1990s, this connectivity was seen largely in terms of the rise of global markets. Today, this connectivity is being looked at in terms of the rise of a global culture. Cultural approaches to Globalization focused on several factors, one of them being religion. Religion had played a significant role in the process of globalizatioon, initially through the expansion of the world religions of Islam and Christianity, and later through the secularizaton process in Protestantism. Recent developments were however, challenging the secularization thesis. What was instead being observed was the resurgence of religion in terms of what were being generally called fundamentalist movements. Fundamentalism was seen by Robertson as an attempt to declare a social identity, a search for a new consciousness in the face of the infinite fragmentation that was taking place in global society. Scott saw fundamentalism as a modern form of a ‘politicized religion’, an attempt by those who called themselves ‘true believers’, to resist the marginalization of religion in a global society. Fundamentalists identified and opposed the agents of secularism and sought to restructure the political, social, cultural and economic relations and institutions, according to traditional religious beliefs and practices. Fundamental movements were both apolitical and of a political nature and could be categorized into (i) the emergence of new religious movements, and (ii) the wave of religious nationalist movements. Niklas Luhmann held that the globalization of society, while structurally favouring the privatization of religion, provided fertile ground for the renewed public influence of religion. We look in greater detail at a sociological understanding of globalization and its effects on religion. What was the future role of religion in society?

16.2 Globalization

Just as post-modernism was the concept of the 1980s, ‘globalization’ could be called the concept of the 1990s. It had begun to replace terms like ‘internationalization’ and ‘trans-nationalization’ as a more suitable concept for describing the ever-intensifying networks of cross-border human interaction (Hoogvelt, 1997:114). Globalization referred to an empirical condition of the complex connectivity evident everywhere in the world in recent times. Complex connectivity involved overcoming cultural distances through penetrating experiences provided through education, employment, consumer culture and the mass media and had been described as being more significant than technological advances and physical mobility (Tomlinson, 1999:32).

Held, McGrew and others were of the view that globalization was neither a wholly novel, nor primarily a modern social phenomenon; only its form had changed over time and across the key domains of human interaction. However, although important continuities with previous phases of globalization existed, contemporary patterns of globalization were unique and consisted of a distinctive historical form, which was itself a product of a unique meeting of social, political, economic and technological forces. They presented the progress of globalization over four broad periods of human history, namely, the pre- modern, early modern, modern and contemporary periods: (i) In the pre-modern period (pre 1500 C.E.), the key agents of Globalization were three-fold: political and military empires, world religions and the migratory movements of nomadic groups, the steppe peoples and farming societies. In this context, globalization was seen as inter-regional and inter-civilizational encounter. (ii) In the early modern period (1500-1800 C.E.), there were several agents of globalizatiuon. What had been broadly called the rise of the West, was regarded as the key agent of Globalization. This included the historical process that produced the emergence and development of the key insitutions of European modernity, the acquisition of technologies and power resources that had exceeded those available to any other civilization and the subsequent creation of European global empires. (iii) The modern period (circa 1850-1945), witnessed an enormous acceleration in the spread and entrenchment of global networks and flows that had begun in the early modern period.

Exploiting these innovations, the reach of western global empires and thus, of western economic power and cultural influence exploded. This era saw very extensive, intensive and socially significant patterns of globalization. (iv) In the contemporary period (from 1950 onwards), globalization was shaped profoundly by the structural consequences of the second world war and the emergence of a world-wide system of nation states, overlaid by multi-lateral, regional and global systems of regulation and governance. This era also experienced extraordinary innovations in the infrastructures of transport and communication and an unparalleled density of institutions of global governance and regulation. This era not only quantitatively surpassed earlier periods, but also displayed qualitative differences (Held, 1999: 414-430).

Several efforts had been made to define globalization. It was best described as complex connectivity that referred to the rapidly developing inter-connectedness and inter-dependencies that characterized modern social life. Giddens defined globalization as 'the intensification of worldwide social relations, which links distant localities in such a way that local happenings are shaped by events occurring many miles away and vice versa' (Giddens, 1990: 64). This was a dialectical process because local happenings could move in an obverse direction, i.e., from the very distanciated relations that shaped them. McGrew also spoke of globalization as 'simply the intensification of global inter-connectedness' and stressed the multiplicity of linkages it implied - goods, capital, social-institutional relationships, technological developments and ideas that all readily flowed across territorial boundaries. Dwelling on the complexity of the Globalization process, Robertson observed that globalization increasingly imposed constraints but it also differentially empowered. He defined globalization as a concept that referred, 'both to the compression of the world and the intensification of consciousness of the world as a whole' (Robertson, 1998:8). We look in greater detail at Robertson's definition of globalization.

The first part of the definition, i.e. global compression, included arguments of theories of dependency and of world systems. Compression led to proximity, which could be seen in terms of the shrinking of distances through the dramatic reduction in time taken either physically (in travel) or representationally (through information technology) to cross distances. It also referred to spatial proximity via the idea of 'stretching' social relations across distances; the transformation of spatial experiences into temporal existence leading to simultaneous and instantaneous experiences. Global proximity resulted from a 'shrinking world' or in McLuhan's terms, the world was reduced to a 'global' village'. The United Nations preferred the term 'global neighbourhood'. Phenomenologically, proximity was being described as a common conscious appearance of the world that was more intimate and more compressed. Metaphorically, it implied an increasing immediacy and consequentiality, thereby reducing real distanced relations (Tomlinson, 1999: 3). Global compression that led to proximity also referred to an increasing level of interdependence between national systems by way of trade, military alliance, domination and cultural imperialism. While Wallerstein (1974) maintained that the globe had been undergoing social compression since the beginning of the sixteenth century, Robertson argued that its history was much longer (Waters, 1995: 41). Hoogvelt asserted that world compression was not a new idea. What made it a novelty in Robertson's work was that he argued that world compression intensified 'global consciousness' (Hoogvelt, 1997: 117).

The second component of Robertson's definition was more important, i.e., the idea of an intensification of global consciousness, which was a relatively new phenomenon. This implied that individual phenomenologies would be addressed to the entire world rather than to local or national sectors of it. Not only in matters of mass media and consumer preferences, but in all issues - military - political issues, position of women and so on. For the first time in history, the globe was becoming a single social and cultural setting. Thus, in all spheres of life, issues could no longer be looked at independently from a local perspective. Globalization had connected the world. Local was raised to the horizon of a 'single world'. There was both an increasing interaction between and a simultaneity of frames of reference. Robertson clarified that this did not imply greater integration but greater unification or systematization, where similar institutions and processes emerged say in banking, political governance or national expressions (national flag, museums, libraries); in other words, there was more connectivity. Nor did Robertson imply more harmony; he was careful to state that while it was a single system; it was divided by conflict and there was not universal agreement on what shape the single system should take in the future. In fact, conflicts could be more unmanageable than the previous disputes between nations. Neither did global unity imply a simplistic uniformity like a world culture. It did not imply wholeness and inclusiveness that was total and encompassing. Rather, it was a complex social and phenomenological condition in which different aspects of human life were brought into articulation with one another. It could lead to cultural differences becoming more accentuated precisely as it was identified in relation to the 'world as a whole'.

In its peculiar twentieth century manifestation of a holistic consciousness, Globalization involved the relativization of individual and national reference points to general and supranational ones; it involved cultural, social and phenomenological linkages between the individual self, national society, international system of societies and humanity in general (Wates, 1995: 42).

16.3 Globalization: A Sociological Understanding

Sociologists had been at the forefront in the effort to give globalization a consistent and rigorous theoretical status. Curiously Globalization, or a concept very much like it, had appeared early in the development of the social sciences. Saint Simon noticed that industrialization was inducing commonalities of practices across the disparate cultures of Europe. Durkheim's legacy to globalization was his theories of differentiation and culture. The state and the collective consciousness had progressively become weaker and abstract in order to encompass intra-society diversity. All this implied that industrialization tended to weaken collective commitments and to open the way for dismantling the boundaries between societies. Just as Durkheim had identified differentiation, Weber identified rationalization as the globalizing solvent. Weber's concern with the success of rationalization and with its spread from the seed-bed origins of Calvinistic Protestantism to infect all Western cultures, implied a homogenization of cultures as well as reduced commitment to such values as patriotism and duty. But even this globalizing effect was restricted to Western Europe. Weber saw no prospect of the spread of rationalized cultural preferences to say India or China, which he regarded as inevitably mired in religious traditionalism. Of all the classical theorists, Karl Marx was most explicitly committed to a globalizing theory of modernization. Globalization caused an enormous increase in the power of the capitalist class because it opened up new markets for it. The establishment of a 'world market' for modern industry gave a cosmopolitan character not only to production but also to consumption (Waters, 1995 : Robertson, 1998: 15 - 18).

In the contemporary period, the development of the term 'globalization' as a specifically sociological concept owed by far the greatest debt to Roland Robertson of the University of Pittsburgh. Robertson stressed that globalization needed to be understood as involving contradictions, resistances and countervailing forces and as involving dialectic of opposed principles and tendencies - local and global, particular and universal, integration and differentiation. Robertson's chief rival for the mantle of parent of the concept of globalization was Anthony Giddens. We look at the contributions of each of these theorists. One of the theoretical debates of globalization in contemporary sociological theory surrounded when it began. Two broad patterns were suggested: (i) The emergence of a New Age (ii) Through the powerful mediating category of modernity.

(I) Emergence of a New Age: Martin Albrow (1997: 6) accepted Globalization on its own terms and in its own time. He spoke of 'The Global Age', that he argued had replaced 'The Modern Age'. The Modern Age had been supplanted and superceded by a new Global Age, with its own axial principles and specific cultural imaginary. The 'epochal shift' from pre-modern to modern to global, lay in the axial principles that put communication, mobility and connectivity at the centre of human lives.

(II) Through the mediating category of modernity. Under this pattern, three possibilities could be specified.

(i) Globalization was seen in the historical context of modernity: Robertson was a strong proponent of this view. Only within the historical appearance of key modern institutions of capitalism, industrialism and urbanism, a developed nation-state system, mass communication and so on, could the complex network of social relations characteristic of globalization arise. Thus, modernity, understood as the nexus of these institutions, was the essential historical context of globalization. Prior to this period, the socio- institutional conditions and the resources of cultural imagination enabling connectivity were simply not in place. Robertson did not subscribe to Giddens' (1990) view that modernity had led directly to globalisation of the contemporary type was set in motion long before modernity; in the economic sphere it predated even the rise of capitalism. He did not however, deny that certain aspects of modernity had greatly amplified globalization, i.e., modernization tended to accelerate the globalization process.

(ii) Globalization was seen as a consequence of modernity: Giddens first (1981, 1985) addressed the issue of the emergence of a global system in a general critique of Marxist theory in which he challenged the view that the development of the capitalist system alone determined the modern history of human societies. Giddens asserted that the development of the nation-states and their capacity to wage war on each other also determined the modern history of human societies. For Giddens, as also for Robertson, the ascendancy of the nation state, which had become a universal political unit, was simultaneous with the development of globalization. Each was impossible without the other. The world was seen as a network of national societies in a global system of international relations. Later, in his book The Consequences of Modernity (1990), Giddens offered one of the most sophisticated analyses of modernization and its inherently globalizing properties. Giddens approach to Globalization was historically discontinuous in contrast to Robertson's approach that was historically continuous. Using the concepts of time-space distanciation, disembedding and reflexivity, he explained how complex relationships developed between local activities and interaction took place across distances. He saw globalization as the result of the inherently expansive characteristics of modernity and listed four such institutional characteristics or 'organizational clusters' : (i) A capitalist system of commodity production (owners of private capital and labour); (ii) industrialization (technology required a collective process of production); (iii) administrative competence of the nation-state (a good surveillance system); and (iv) military order (for centralization of control within an industrialized society). He explained that his discussion of globalization focused on modernity, since he saw globalization as a consequence of modernity. Modernity implied universalizing tendencies that made possible global networks of relationships and more basically extended temporal - spatial distance of social relationships. Giddens was critical of the undue reliance that sociologists placed on the idea of 'society', where this meant a bounded system. He was of the view that this should be replaced by starting points that concentrated on analyzing how social life was ordered across time and space.

(iii) the hegemony of modernity: Wallerstein saw globalization in its strategic role of the maintenance of western cultural dominance and its universalizing and hegemonic tendencies. The concept of globalization was an obvious object for ideological suspicion, because like modernization, a predecessor and related concept, it was bound up intrinsically with the pattern of capitalist development as it had branched out through political and cultural arenas. It did not imply that every culture / society had to become westernized and capitalist, but it implied that they had to establish their position in relation to the capitalist West. Wallerstein concentrated on the emergence and evolution of the modern European world system, which he traced from its late medieval origins of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries to the present day. Capitalism functioned in relation to the long-term cyclical rhythms, the central one of which was the regular pattern of expansion and contraction of the whole economy, which over the years 'have transformed the capitalist world economy from a system located primarily in Europe, to one that covers the entire globe.

The search for identity was a basic sub-concern of globalization, where the creation of viable identities was a fundamental issue. Modernization, Giddens maintained, with its basic tendency to differentiation, increased the possibilities of choice, but on the other hand created problems of identity formation at both the individual and collective levels. MacDonald (1999) also argued that both individuals and groups that were marginalized by globalization struggled to establish coherent identities that were being threatened by contradictory social imperatives (see Bendle, 2002:3). Other scholars, exploring the crises of identity in the context of high modernity or globalization, argued that the fragmented nature of identities in the face of differentiation, led marginalized groups to participate in social movements in a search for new identities. In other words, one of the responses to globalization was the participation in projects to change the system.

Identity in pre-modern societies was seen as synonymous with the 'core' or centre of existence. Post modernist views rejected the notion of 'core' and considered identity to be conceived of as something more superficial, transient, multiple and manipulable, something that emerged as a product of discourse. Giddens (1991) saw the transformation in self-identity as one of the requirements in the dialectic of the local - global conditions. In other words, the greater the deterritorialization of a society, the more was the need to negotiate lifestyle choices from the diversity of options (ibid: 7).

The formation of identity also became the key component in the social dynamics of high modernity or globalization as discussed in the works of Heelas, Lash and Morris (1996). Heelas explained that in traditional societies, identity was inscribed and based on an authoritative taken-for-grantedness, whereas in a detraditionalized society, identity was constructed and persons acquired opportunities to critically reflect upon and even reject what traditional society generally offered. Identity was no longer seen as involving the self's non-reflective, unquestioning 'inscription' within a tradition, rather it was seen as emerging in a discourse. It was seen in a globalized society as a shift from the passive level of acceptance to the active level of reflexivity and critique.

16.4 Globalization and Religion

With this brief introduction to globalization in the context of modernity, we now look at the response of religion to the globalization process. How had the process of globalization affected religion? And how had religion responded? Religion was one of the areas where, in the breakdown of familiar boundaries and power balances in a globalized situation, efforts were made to restructure new communities. Religion became one of the bases for social transformation both at the level of people's everyday lives and at the national level. If religion was seen as one of the most fundamental means of organizing human life, then the seeds of globalization could be found in religion itself. Some scholars had suggested that the idea of globalization was put forward by the 'hyper-globalization' of some religions, such as the Catholic Church that supported the idea of the world as one place.

A global focus on religion had emerged because of a cluster of issues: (i) the debate about whether societies were becoming more or less secularized, (ii) the resurgence of religion (or the diffusion of religion as a category), and (iii) the emergence in the 1970s and the 1980s of church-state and religion-politics conflations and tensions across much of the globe, commonly referred to as ‘fundamentalisms. One of the myths of modernity was that religion would be abolished, i.e., the world would be secularized. Instead, there emerged a proliferation of religions. Mendieta claimed that globalization not only accelerated the process of emergence of new religious movements and the awareness that religion could not be abolished, it also led to religion taking on a new character, i.e., movements of both religious revival and religious activism (Mendieta, 2001: 46). These fundamental movements that were emerging were regarded as a search for a new consciousness, the search for an identity in response to the new demands of contemporary society. Cultural survival was regarded as being the main cause of religious revivalism. But first we look at the role of religion in the emergence of globalization.

Robertson, who had been credited with first analyzing globalization from a sociological perspective, had a dominant interest in trying to isolate the period during which contemporary globalization reached a point, when it was so well established that a particular pattern or form prevailed. According to Robertson, the expansion of the world religions of Islam and Christianity had an important role in this process. The expansion of Islam took place with the expansion of the Arab and the Ottoman empires from the twelfth to the fifteenth centuries. By the eighteenth century, it had achieved a presence in diverse regions. Christianity had to wait for the military and colonial expansion of Europe in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to acquire a global presence. Prior to this period, the globalizing consequence was the incorporation of tribal peasants into large-scale political systems. These two universalistic religions of Christianity and Islam, both derivatives of the Abrahamic faith, became universalizing religions and most effective globalizers because of their claims that the world was created by a single God and that humanity was a common force of existence in relation to that God. It led to the argument that humanity constituted a single community that disvalued geographical localities and political territories, that there was a single value reference for every person in the world and that this God proposed a single set of legal and moral laws.

By the sixteenth century, a newer and far more important globalizing religious force had emerged, namely, Protestantism. Catholicism had blurred the relationship between state and Church so that a series of conflicts emerged between kings and Popes. The Reformation resolved the dispute between state and Church by either subordinating the Church to the State (as in England), or by secularizing the state (as in USA and France). The state could now rely for its legitimization on the political process of nationalism rather than on religious legitimations. The power of the state thus grew and was itself a prerequisite for globalization (Waters, 1995: 127 - 128). This view of the central role of the nation-state in the development of globalization was expressed by both Giddens and Robertson as seen earlier. One was impossible without the other.

In the modern period, since the 1960s, many sociologists had put forward the notion that religion in the contemporary Western world had become increasingly privatized. Most prominently T. Parsons (1966: 134), P. Berger (1973: 133f), T. Luckmann (1967: 103) and R. Bellah (1970: 43), had interpreted secularization in the modern world to mean that traditional religion was now primarily the concern of the individual and had therefore lost much of its 'public' relevance. Privatization referred to the limitation of the relevance of religion to the private sphere of the individual's life, where in some cases the common universe of meaning was limited or fragmented only to the level of the nuclear family. This implied that the 'religious preference' could be as easily rejected as it was adopted (Berger, 1973: 137). Institutional differentiation (which Luhmann called functionally differentiated societal sub-systems) and pluralistic individual identities were basic features of modern societies. Secularization was the consequence of the relative independence of these initial sub-systems of society from religious norms, values and justifications, i.e. religion now had a limited legitimizing role in a highly differentiated society; it suffered the fate of compartmentalization.

What did this imply for religion in general? For an answer, Beyer looked to Niklas Luhmann's (1982) thesis, which he felt allowed a clear examination of the problems and potential of religion in a contemporary global society. The Luhmannian thesis held that the globalization of society, while structurally favouring privatization of religion, also provided fertile ground for the renewed public influence of religion, i.e. religion not only retreated from important aspects of local life; it also developed an institutionally specialized sub-system of its own. By public influence, he meant that one or more religions could become the source of collective commitment; collective action in the name of specific religious norms now became legitimate (see Beyer, 1999: 373). In the Luhmannian scheme, the rise of the expert in modern society reflected a socio-structural situation, in which professionals became the prime public representatives of societal sub-systems. Thus, public importance of a system rose and fell with the public influence of its professional. The question that followed was under what circumstances, would individual persons listen to religious leaders, to a new revelation or to a revival of the old beliefs? Religion needed to provide a service that not only supported and enhanced the religious faith of its adherents, but also by which it could impose itself, by having far-reaching implications outside the strictly religious realm. It was in this context that contemporary religious movements were of particular interests. These religious movements are discussed below under the title 'Fundamentalist Movements'. Robertson saw fundamentalist movements as a means to establish and identity, where the search for local identities in a global world was becoming unified.

16.5 Fundamentalist Movements

The contemporary religious movements that were challenging the secularization thesis could be observed in what was broadly and generally being called fundamentalist movements. Fundamentalism, as John Hawley explained, was an embattled term. It first arose in the United States in about 1920s as a term of self-reference, adopted by a group of Protestant Christians who supported a series of pamphlets called 'The Fundamentals' (1910 - 1915). These writings criticized the evils of modernism, especially scientific rationalism, an 'uncritical' use of higher criticism of the Bible and perceived lapses in moral values. They favoured returning to 'the fundamentals' of Christian belief and practice, the 'eternal pillars of an idealized past'. In time, the liberal Christians and modernists of a more secular nature began to use the term 'fundamentalist' in a rather broader sense, to designate these groups which they saw as naive enough to believe that they could reverse the course of history in favour of a mythical, dogmatic and socially homogenous Christian past. (These positions were articulated by conservative Christian groups, mainly evangelical Protestants).

The Islamic Revolution in Iran in 1979, put the term 'fundamentalism' into wide use for the first time. It subsequently referred to religious groups that took political action to reject Western secular modernism in its various forms. As Robertson explained, the term 'fundamentalism' was hardly used outside the United States of America till as late as the 1970s, and then only on a limited scale. Only in the wake of the Iranian Revolution of 1978 - 79, did there arise the tendency to speak of a globe-wide fundamentalism. Eventually, this term was adopted by people and movements moving across the globe and came to represent an ancient and a narrow rigid mentality. Some of the indigenous movements around the globe adopted and accepted some of the diagnosis that fundamentalisms were fuelled by basically religious and spiritual orientations (Robertson, 1998: 169).

These days, the term 'fundamentalism' is being applied to two different categories of religious movements: (i) to the emergence of what were termed new religious movements that were revitalizing old religions, and (ii) to a wave of what were called religious nationalist movements, expressing themselves as religio-political movements that were explicit attempts to create a public influence for religion. We look at each of these recent developments separately.

(i) The New Religious Movements

Social theorists observed that by the 1960s, contrary to the earlier secularization theory, religion was not receding unilaterally from human life. However, religion was not the same any more either. A new religious consciousness was emerging that was not simply a reassertion of traditional religiosity; it was a search for a 'new consciousness', a search for a new religious identity and for new meanings in the face of fragmentation and differentiation in a modern world; a search for an identity that had a profound, religious quality to it. These new religious movements, as this emerging new religious consciousness was being termed, were the response of contemporary humans to the contemporary social conditions, just as a traditional religion had been the response of humans to the social conditions of that time. The ideology of equality and democracy, the emphasis on youth, the new relativism in human thinking, the search for the renewal of self, were all characteristic of the new religious movements.

The term ‘new religious movements’ was initially applied by social scientists to refer to a wide variety of spiritual enthusiasms that had emerged in the West after the 1960s. However, it was later being used chronologically to refer to all types of religiojns that had established themselves in Western Europe, North America, India and Japan since 1945 and in Africa since the 1890s (Clarke, 1988: 907). The term was being used as an umbrella for the diversity of phenomena ranging from cults, sects, spiritual groups or alternate belief systems to doctrinal deviations within world religions and major churches, to passing fads and spiritual enthusiasms of a questionable religious kind. The term had also included a spiritual renewal of self and millennial groups. Some of the new religious movements in India included ISKON or International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Rajneeshism, Transcendental Meditation and Sai Baba Movement. Japan had an estimated two hundred indigenous or non-indigenous new religious movements. The more popular wee Soka Gakkai or Value Creation Society, Tenrikyo or Heavenly Wisdom and Risshokoseikai. Africa had some twenty thousand movements, some with only twenty members, others with several thousand. Some of the larger ones were Godianism, Deima and Aladura. In America, the new religious movements were largely known as ‘Jesus’ Movements or Pentecostal Movements (Wilson, 1982; Clarke, 1988). Globalization was enabling the spread of some of these movements, which were using the advanced technology presently available to become globally accessible. The nature of these new religious movements has been discussed in detail in the previous chapter.

(ii) Religious Nationalist Movements

In the 1990s, scholars sensitive to the problem of the emergence of religious groups, which took political action leading even to national revolutions, had suggested a series of alternate terms to designate these conservative, neo-traditionalist and often militant religious groups. One such term favoured by writes such as Peter van der Veer and Mark Juergensmeyer was ‘religious nationalism’. Juergensmeyer explained that when a religious perspective was fused with the political and social destiny of a nation, it was referred to as religious nationalism. Religious nationalists were not jsut religious fanatics. For the most party they were political activists, who were seriously attempting to reformulate the ‘modern’ language of politics in order to provide a new basis for the nation-state. They were concerned not so much about the political structure of the nation-state, as about the political ideology underlying it (Juergensmeyer, 1994: xiii; D’Souza, 2000: 29). Robertson saw this religious nationalism as an assertion of a deep particularity, a declaration by a local group of a political identity in the face of globalization. Nikkie Keddie, who questioned whether nationalism was always the main focus of such efforts, had proposed the term ‘new religious politics’(see Hawley, 1999 : 3).

Martin Marty and R. Scott Appleby, in a famous Chicago study titled Fundamentalisms Observed (1991), had elaborately developed the characteristics of Fundamentalism (which we are here terming ‘religious nationalism’). They explained fundamentalism as a reaction by the emerging nation-states of the non-western world against the invasive, intrusive and threatening features of modernity. For example, Islamic fundamentalism represented a delayed reaction to the hegemony of European colonial rule after they became independent nation-states. Religious identity was used as a protective shield against the onslaught of globalization, which was marked by the entry of integrated ‘market systems’, which came along with a variety of commodities, values, beliefs and styles of being. The fear of extinction and the threat to survival both as a people and as a culture and the loss of distinctiveness in the rise of homogeneity, resulted in the introduction of a comprehensive social system based upon religious principles that embraced law, policy, society, economy and culture. Thus, fundamentalism tended to be totalitarian in its practice and encompassed all areas of private and public life. Religion was declared not just a faith but also a way of life. Fundamentalism of this nature was not religious in the classical sense of the term, but was a variant of secular faith couched in religious language.

Religious nationalist movements, it was further observed, often invoked authenticity and ‘authentic culture’ as a weapon against what was foreign and alien. However, this authenticity was questionable, as it became difficult to prove what was authentic and what was not. The invoking of certain traditions and the denying of others required a reconstruction of history, if not its destruction. Historians took pains to demonstrate that historically inter-cultural exchange, trade and conquest had rendered any notion of authenticity highly problematic. Fundamentalist movements then relied a great deal on invented traditions (Marty and Appleby, 1991: 814-837).

However, fundamentalism was not a total rejection of the modern. Rather, it had been seen to draw selectively on both tradition and modernity and to employ every available method of modern science and technology to further its own ends of establishing a distinct identity. Tradition was invoked in areas of dress, treatment of women, family systems. In an edited book titled, Religious Fundamentalism and the Human Rights of Women, (1999), Hawley wrote that until recently it was insufficiently appreciated that issues of gender played a crucial role in the language of fundamentalism. ‘What is being championed is a divinely sanctioned vision of natural differences between the sexes that make it appropriate for women to live within boundaries and to live under men’s protection, even surveillance’ (Hawley, 1993). Modernity was invoked in the form of modern technology and scientific developments, information technology, modern weaponry, arms, computers, internet and mass public education. Fundamentalism itself had been supported by foreign capital, while professing and propagating indigenization (a contradiction). Marty and Appleby observed that in its strategies and methods, fundamentalism displayed a closer affinity to modernism than to traditionalism. Thus, while fundamentalism resented or envied the powers and influence of modernity, it shrewdly exploited its processes and instrumentalities. It had sometimes used democratic processes to come to power (Marty and Appleby, 1991

: 827). Lechner contended that where the discontents of modernity were felt more keenly and defined more sharply, new and stronger Fundamentalist movements were likely to emerge (see Robertson, 1998: 170).

Fundamentalism, then, was driven by the affinity-identity passions of ethnic communities and religious groups, often thirsting for self-esteem and dignity. Fundamentalism, as seen above, was an effort to 'neutralize the other' and establish one's own identity. In other words, the question of 'cultural survival' was at the core of the issue of religious revivalism. This process could be observed in the East European countries that belonged to divergent cultural communities and ethnic groups after the demise of the Soviet Union. Their demand for economic autonomy and preservation of cultural identities resulted in the ethnic conflicts between majority Muslim and Christian minority Srebs in Bosnia, between minority Christian Serbs and majority Muslims of Albanian origin in the Kosovo province of Yugoslavia. This process can also be observed in parts of Indonesia today. In India, religious-cultural and ethnic clashes are being experienced in the efforts of those of the Hindutva ideology, the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh (RSS) or 'Sangh Parivar', to create a communal divide between the Hindu majority and the Muslim and Christian minority communities in India.

16.6 Hindu Nationalism

Hindu nationalism emerged in context of the freedom movement in India. As Pandey observed, Hindu nationalism or communalism developed in the late colonial period, arising concurrently with nationalism, if not being projected as a counterweight to it (Pandey, 1994: 13). In the nineteenth century, we see the beginnings of the growth and development of the national freedom movement. Hindu nationalism emerged at that phase, where religion was sought to be made the basis, not just of the political struggle for freedom, but also as the basis of the emerging identity of India. The Hindu nationalists were mainly politically oriented persons, who had sought to politicize religion and identify India exclusively as Hindu, to the disregard and exclusion of the other religious communities in India. The struggle for nationalism in India was taking place within the context of colonialism.

At the turn of the century, the precursor of Hindu nationalism was Bal Gangadhar Tilak (1856-1920), in Maharashtra. But he did not create a Hindu organization inside or outside the Congress and instead remained within the Congress party as an 'extremist' (Jaffrelot, 1996: 17). From within the Congress, Tilak sought to politically mobilize the masses of India, in order to achieve political freedom, and he used religious symbolism for the same. His organization of the Ganpati festival in 1893, and the Shivaji festival in 1895 (Chaudhary, 1978: 29), led to the alienation and antagonism of the Muslim section of India's population. By this time, to a section of Indian politicians, the spirit of Indian nationalism was assuming a Hindu character with a note of exclusion in it (DeBary, 1991: 140; Embree, 1989: 158; Majumdar, 1965: 478). As Varma explained, Tilak was a sanatanist Hindu, who in a speech said, "The term Sanatan (eternal) Dharma shows that our religion is very old-as old as the history of the human race itslef. Vedic religion was the religion of the Aryans from a very early time- Religion is an element of nationality. During Vedic times, India was a self- contained country. It was united as a great nation' (Varma, 1963: 220-265).

The marriage of politics and religion was complete in the formation of the Hindu Mahasabha. The pro-Muslim bias of the British administration - seen in the granting of various important concessions, one of which was the setting up of separate electorates in 1909-led to the Arya Samaj in Punjab taking a militant, nationalist turn. Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, who later became the first vice-chancellor of the Benares Hindu University, together with other leading Arya Samajists, founded the Hindu Mahasabha in 1915, which soon developed into a right-wing militant Hindu political party (Madan, 1997: 218; DeBarry, 1991: 159; Klostermaier, 1989: 403).

In 1909 Lala Lajput Rai, an activist and senior member of the Arya Samaj in Punjab, declared that 'the Hindus are a 'nation' in themselves, because they represent a type of civilization all their own' (Jaffrelot, 1996: 19). He was calling on the use of the German word 'nation'; whch connoted a people, implying a community possessing a certain civilization and culture. THis view clearly called on the ethnic natinalism as opposed to a territorial nationalism. Soon after, in the 1911 census, as contrasted to the census of 1891, the Arya Samajists declared themselves not as 'Aryas', but as 'Hindus'.

While the Congress Party, influenced by English universalistic concepts, defined the Indian nation as consisting of all individuals, of all communities, living within the frontiers of the British - Indian realm (a territorial nationalism), some militant Hindus, especially certain Arya Samajists, were more in sympathy with German definitions giving an ethnic basis for nationalism (Smith, 1983 : 217), and jseeing the development of a race as the organic expression of an essential spirit (Graham, 1993 : 44). Thus, the territorial definijition of nationalism was sought to be replaced by an ethnic nationalism by the Hindu nationalists. India's nationhood had been classified by Smith as a territorial, post-independence integration, and not as an ethnic nationalism. Smith however, classified German nationalism as an ethnic, pre-independent, pan nationalism (Smith, 1983: 223, 229).

Initially, the Hindu Mahasabha funtioned as a pressure group within the Congress. However, by 1937, the Hindu Mahasabha was excluded from the Congress on account of its communalism. By the 1920s, the Hindu Mahasabha had acquired a more clearly Hindu nationalist orientation under the pretext of a return to the Vedic Golden Age. It sought to maintain the ‘Chaturvarna’, a distinctive feature of Aryan civilization, and yet evolve a union and solidarity among the various ‘water-tight (caste) compartments, each having a social culture and life of their own’ (Jaffrelot, 1996: 19 - 25).

V. D. Savarkar (1883 - 1966), a Maharashtrian Brahmin and future president of the Hindu Mahasabha from 1937-42, was instrumental in bringing about this qualitative leap of the Hindu Mahasabha through his book, Hindutva: Who is a Hindu

? first published in Nagpur, in 1923. It served as a basic text for nationalist ‘Hinduness’ (the generally accepted translation of Hindutva). For Savarkar, culture was inextricably linked to territory and he claimed that membership of the Hindu nation depended upon an acceptance of India as, both fatherland and holyland. He held that Muslims and Christians looked outside India for the sacred places of their religion and therefore did not regard India as their holyland. In defining Hindu nationality, he underlined the importance of Hindutva, a religious, racial and cultural entity (Graham, 1993: 45). He bitterly opposed Nehru’s concept of a secular state and continued agitating for a total Hinduization of India. The Hindutva of Savarkar was conceived primarily as an ethnic community, possessing a territory, sharing the same racial and cultural characteristics and united by the common flow of blood into ‘our’ race - three attributes which stemmed from the mythical reconstruction of the Vedic Golden age, having originated from the ‘Aryan’ race (Klostermaier, 1989: 403; Graham, 1993: 43; Jaffrelot, 1996 : 28).

The Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh or RSS, was founded at Nagpur in 1925, under the leadership of Hedgewar (1889 - 1940), who was medical doctor but whenever practiced medicine. He sought to unite Hindus to stand upto the Muslims and also to radicalize the Hindus to hasten British withdrawal. Due to the divisiveness of Hindu society, the RSS had concentrated on the Hindu sanghatan (Malkani, 1980: 24, 26). Hedgewar (or Doctor Ji, as he was called) sought to define the nation in exclusively Hindu terms (Madan, 1997: 221). However, under the leadership of Golwalkar, who took over the leadership of the RSS in 1940 on the death of its founder Hedgewar, the first, coherent exposition of doctrine of Hindu nationalism emerged.

In, We, or Our Nationhood Defined, published in 1939, Golwalkar, like Savarkar, argued that a nation was the product of a number of factors, including a sense of territory, racial unity, religion, culture and language, but that the factor of special importance was religion. Golwalkar, or Guruji as he was called, claimed Bharatvarsha had been a ‘rashtra’ since Vedic times and upheld that ‘the non-Hindu people in Hindustan must adopt the Hindu culture and religion and must entertain no ideas but those for the glorification of the Hindu race and culture - claiming nothing, deserving no privileges - not even citizen’s rights’ (Malkani, 1980: 42; Embree, 1974: 115; Graham, 1993: 45 - 46). ‘This Hindu nation’ wrote Malkani

‘was born with ‘sanatan dharma’. and the sanatan dharm is nationalism’. ‘Hindu’ is not a religion, it is a nationality, and all those who live in India are Hindus, whatever their religion (Malkani, 1980: 187, 191). ‘Like Savarkar’s Hindutva, Golwalkar’s definition of Hindu is political rather than religious’ (Heehs, 1998: 117).

Hindu nationalism then, emerged in India in the 1920s, in the writings of Savarkar and Golwalkar and as Pandey observed, has led to the communalizing of politics in India. For the nationalists, locked as they were in the 1920s and 1930s, in a bitter struggle to overthrow the colonial regime, communalism appeared as a great political threat, a source of danger to the cause of nationalism. Hindu nationalism or communalism was seen as nationalism gone wrong (Pandey, 1994:914).

The RSS was strictly organized from the very beginning, was the most powerful and the most controversial Hindu organization of the times. It claimed to be a cultural organization and was not a registered political party. The RSS gave birth to a great number of front organizations like the Bharatiya Mazdoor Sabhs, a trade union and the Viswa Hindu Parishad, a religious organization founded in 1964, which attempted to articulate a kind of universal Hinduism that would embrace the different sects and at the same time possess a basic common creed and common practice. Other organizations included the Bajrang Dal.

After Golwalkar’s death in 1973, the supreme leadership of the RSS or post of ‘sarsanghchalak’ passed on to Madhukar Dattatreya, also known as Balasaheb Deoras. He was a bachelor and a member of the RSS, since he was twelve years old. He echoed Savarkar when stating, ‘We do believe in one culture and one nation, Hindu Rashtra. But our definition of Hindu is not limited to any particular kind of faith. Our definition of Hindu includes those who believe in the one-culture and one- nation theory of this country. They can all form part of the Hindu-rastra, so by Hindu we do not mean any particular type of faith. We use the word Hindu in a broader sense’ (see Klostermaier, 1989: 407).

Many Indians who subscribe to the idea of a secular, democratic state with equal rights for all its members, regardless of race, creed or sex, consider the RSS to be a threat to this State. The RSS and its front organizations remain the most visible manifestation of extremist and radical political Hinduism on the national level. Though there are others, they are not very influential like the Ram Rajya Parisad or ‘Kingdom of God Party’ founded in 1940 by Swami Karpatriji Maharaj. Others were only at the state level, like the Shiv Sena whose basis of identity was Maharashtrian and not necessarily religion (Klostermaier, 1989: 407).

16.7 Let us Sum Up

In his initial understanding about the relationship of globalization to fundamentalism (seen more generally as the search for fundamentals), Robertson saw fundamentalism as an attempt to express the identity of a society, a felt necessity to declare a social identity. This aspect saw fundamentalism as a reaction to globalization resulting from the compression of an inter-societal system. Fundamentalism was about differentiations and distinctions between the self and the other. In his recent attempts to grasp analytically the more general problem of fundamentalism, Robertson saw Fundamentalism more as an aspect of, or a creation of globalization, rather than a reaction to it. It was an assertion of a deep particularity, i.e., a global construction and dissemination of ideas concerning the value of particularism, a declaration of a particular identity. He saw it in the context of the apparent paradox of globality- locality. The idea of Fundamentalism as a reaction or resistance to globalization was not discarded, only it was built into the general process of globalization. He preferred to see fundamentalism as a 'search' for fundamentals in the context of the compression of the world, which was a more respectful acknowledgement of peoples' real practices rather than the term 'extremism'. Fundamentalism thus constituted ways of finding a place within the world as a whole, ways that frequently involved attempts to enhance the power of the groups concerned. It was not necessarily, anti-global. It actually involved a quest for community, for stable values and beliefs and was an assertion of power. Robertson explained it in terms of a two-fold process - particularization of the universal and the universalization of the particular. This idea of the right to identity, 'the struggle for recognition' as Fukuyama (1992) described it, was widespread. Fundamentalism then was a product of globality, and even though it took ostensibly anti-global forms, it tended to partake of the distinctive features of globality (Robertson, 1998: 175 - 178).

In conclusion, it could be observed that for the majority of cultures around the world, religion remained a permanent constituent of human life. In a globalized situation, the coexistence and interweaving of religion and the secular was observed, not a false divide between them. Religion had remained on one hand the foundation for national differences, and on the other hand the basis of achievement of full humanity. Religion thus, both furthered and resisted Globalization; in fact, globalization had revitalized religion (Mendieta, 2001: 621). The term 'fundamentalism' is being applied today to two categories of religious movements. One, to new religious movements and spiritual enthusiasms that are seeking a 'return to fundamentals' or are a new religious response to social conditions of contemporary society. And two, to religious nationalisms that are more of political expressions by religious leaders seeking a political identity for a religious culture. Religion in the world seemed to be going on in both conservative and liberal directions, i.e., concentrating on ministering to private religious choices and entering the political and public arena. It is better today to speak of global fundamentalisms rather than a single world-wide fundamentalist movement and to acknowledge the agenda of each as being discrete in its local setting.

16.7 Let us sum up

Thus, to conclude, looking at the future role of religion in society, we observe that religion and politics had been separated in a post-Enlightenment period of the secular west, which may not have been viewed in this manner in a pre-Enlightenment period of western culture. (In India such a separation may not have existed at all as held by T. N. Madan, 1983). Socio-cultural gaps of our uneven modern world would continue to evoke varied responses from both religious and secular ideologies. The first step in coping with Fundamentalisms was to appreciate the fundamentalist dilemma. The symbolic and emotive power of Fundamentalism was as authentically modern as it was persistently disruptive (Lawrence, 1999: 99). Understanding the present role of religion in a globalized society may then require a shift from the Enlightenment period paradigm, without a reductionist approach in any direction - religion, politics or culture.
